It is unclear what effect the removal of restrictions on women's hours will have on arrangements for the whole work force in respect of meals, rest breaks and rest days. Arguably men as well as women have benefited from the so-called restrictive legislation in the past, in that employers who have been obliged to accept statutory restrictions for women have found it simplest to allow them for men too, although men have no statutory right to meal breaks or rest days.

We should like this legislation to be extended to men. If the Government do not support our amendments, it will be a step back into the dark ages and will show Britain to be far behind other European countries in welfare rights and the protection of workers.

Mr. Lee: I say with tongue in cheek that I am pleased that the Opposition have accepted, albeit reluctantly, that it is no longer necessary to retain statutory restrictions on the total hours women may work either each day or during a week. That will enable women to participate in overtime working if they wish and to be generally more flexible on overtime if that is what they and their employers want.

I am genuinely puzzled as to why the Opposition do not extend the same logic to the restrictions governing spells of work and rest intervals. The Government are not saying that women ought to be forced to work much longer spells against their wills. In very few circumstances would it be sensible for the employer to ask them to work longer spells and for the women to agree to that. I mention the example of Chester zoo used by the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd).

Why should women not be capable of arranging their rest breaks and their total hours without the clumsy intervention of the law? The reasoning seems especially strange given that many women do not rely on statutory intervention to regulate meal and rest intervals in other sectors of the economy apart from mines, quarries and factories.

When Lord Wedderburn introduced similar amendments in the other place, he asked what was wrong with legislation in relation to spells of work. The answer is that we simply do not believe it to be necessary. Such matters are more effectively organised by individual or collective agreement when the circumstances and needs of the employees and employer can be taken into account. There is no justification for such restrictions remaining only for women working in mines, quarries and factories. Such restrictions are discriminatory and, where women must take compulsory meal breaks for which they are not paid, they can be disadvantageous.

The available evidence on health and safety is inconclusive. Dr. Harrington said in a summary of his review that fatigue has an objective concept, and was of dubious long-term significance to health. He also said that fatigue leading to increased errors and diminished performance could be offset by improved motivation and the appropriate use of work breaks. That is not to say that the breaks need to be inflexibly laid down by statute. Operational demands often require more adaptable arrangements than the existing legal provisions allow for. Furthermore, the better conditions prevail in our factories compared to the era when the legislation was first introduced, and that may, as the Equal Opportunities Commission noted in paragraph 381 of its 1979 report, obviate the need for formal meal breaks. Operatives may be content to stay at or near their work stations for longer periods if this meets the needs of the process.

The argument has been put that just because statutory rest intervals are not appropriate elsewhere it does not mean that they are inappropriate for mines, quarries and factories. But equally no convincing argument has been made as to why mines, quarries and factories should be a special case. Why should discriminatory restrictions remain only for women in those sectors? We are convinced that it is totally anachronistic and anomalous for these narrow restrictions to remain. Accordingly, I strongly urge that the amendment should be withdrawn.

Mrs. Clwyd: The Minister's response does not surprise me. He mentioned Dr. Harrington and was selective in the quotes that he took from Dr. Harrington's report. He did not mention that Dr. Harrington recognised evidence linking gastric and duodenal ulcers with shift work. He believed that digestive disorders were one and a half to two times more severe in shift workers, and that their ulcer rate was twice that of day workers. He said:

"There is reason to believe that nightshift work may well affect the digestive system."

The programme outlined by the Minister, which does not even allow for a statutory break, will no doubt lead to even more digestive problems. How can he expect us to believe that he is serious about health when he makes such ludicrous suggestions?

The Minister mentioned the Health and Safety Executive. Despite all the protestations of Conservative Members about the role that the executive will play, the truth is that under this Government the Health and Safety Executive has had its powers reduced every year since 1979. The Health and Safety inspectorate has also been reduced under this Government. Nowadays, some factories are not even visited once in 10 years. How can the Minister expect us to take his protestations seriously?

It is ludicrous to suggest that women will have some sort of collective bargaining power, because many of them are not in trade unions and have no bargaining muscle. In 1986, I would have expected the House to recognise the need to protect both male and female workers. Instead, the legislation is being repealed, and that will take us back 15 years.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 9

CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENT, REPEALS AND SAVING

Mr. Lee: I beg to move amendment No. 9, in page 8, line 16, leave out 'sections 4(1) and' and insert 'section'.

Mr. Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendment No. 10.

Mr. Lee: These are simple, technical amendments. They remove from the Bill the reference to section 4(1) of the Equal Pay Act. The whole of section 4 of the Equal Pay Act was repealed on 25 September 1986 by the Wages Act. Therefore, to retain the reference to section 4(1) in the Bill would serve no purpose and would be meaningless.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 10, in page 8, line 17, leave out 'they refer' and insert 'it refers'.—[Mr. Lee.]

Bill to be read the Third time tomorrow.

PUBLIC TRUSTEE AND ADMINISTRATION OF FUNDS BILL [LORDS]

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 69 (Second Reading Committees), That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Question agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Committee of the whole House.

Committee tomorrow.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, in respect of the Family Law Bill [Lords] and the Parliamentary Constituencies Bill [Lords], new Clauses and new Schedules to be moved in Committee may be accepted by the Clerks at the Table before the Bill has been read a second time.—[Mr. Malone.]

PETITION

Salmon (Illegal Fishing)

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): I beg to present a petition that was begun and promoted by the Welsh Salmon and Trout Angling Association. It is supported by clubs and anglers from Llandysul to London, from Bath to Bangor, from Merthyr to Manchester and from Dyfed to Dunoon. More than 18,600 signatures have been collected.

The petitioners applaud the introduction of the Salmon Bill but fear that, unless further measures are taken to control illegal fishing, salmon stocks in Welsh rivers will continue to decline.

The petition states:

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that . . . the Standing Advisory Committee . . . be directed to examine and recommend . . . the necessity or otherwise of providing for the individual identification of salmon as an aid to combating illegal fishing.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Housing Defects (Cannock and Burntwood)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Malone.]

10 pm

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): This is the first time I have had the privilege of raising an Adjournment debate. It is a pleasure to do so tonight. Perhaps the House will understand the defects in a particular house, Broadcasting house, but, as Broadcasting house is not in my constituency, I have no doubt that you, Mr. Speaker, would rule me out of order were I to make further references to it.

I am grateful for the opportunity to voice the concerns of an important group of constituents who have lived for the past three or four years under the cloud of ownership of defective homes. This debate concerns properties in the Cannock and Burntwood area which have been subject to defect. I am delighted to see my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle), who is renowned for his knowledge of housing matters and who also has constituents living within the Cannock Chase district council area in Rugeley who are affected by this problem. Nearly all the constituents I am talking about are beneficiaries of the Government's excellent right-to-buy policy. They are former tenants who have exercised their right to purchase their own homes. It is greatly to the Government's credit that, when it was realised that pre-cast reinforced concrete homes, which these people had purchased, were inherently defective, they acted swiftly to provide a remedy.

The essence of the problem for most of them was not that their homes were falling down but that one of the principal benefits of home ownership — the ability to mortgage one's home or to sell it and buy another—was at a stroke denied them as their properties became blighted. I believe that the Government therefore must be given credit for taking action in 1984 to bring legislation to the statute book to provide some remedy.

Much of the credit for implementing the Housing Defects Act 1984 and devising and revising the scheme which the Act brought into being must go to my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young), who held the post of Under-Secretary of State with considerable distinction.

I approve entirely of the licensing concept which was designed to provide owners of reinstated homes with that peace of mind that they currently do not have. It was inevitable that the speed with which PRC Homes Ltd.— set up by the National House Building Council and by the Government — could move would be slower than everyone would have wished and certainly slower than the affected owners and the hon. Members who represent those owners would have wished.

I believe that many of the original problems have been ironed out. After some prompting by Ministers, who themselves have been prompted by right hon. and hon. Members, PRC Homes is now implementing a much quicker appraisal process to ensure that schemes are examined as quickly as possible. There are in my constituency four categories of pre-cast reinforced concrete houses: Cornish units, Wates homes, Smith houses and Reema hollow panels. The last category has only recently been discovered, but the rest have caused anxiety and distress lasting many years.

I should like to emphasise the considerable anxiety caused to these people — not because their homes are falling down, but because many of them have invested a great deal of their own money in these properties and have brought them up to a very acceptable standard. Some of them are really beautiful homes, and there is nothing wrong with them, although in some cases signs of defects are emerging. For many owners the homes are adequate and they want to live in them.

The problem is that the owners are effectively trapped in those homes. One of the problems of a council house tenant is that he does not have the facility of moving as readily as a home-owner. The anxiety of not being able to enjoy the benefits of home ownership has caused great distress. It is not unreasonable that people should look to the Government, who implemented the Act, to do all in their power to accelerate the process of appraisal of the schemes submitted to PRC Homes, to ensure that there are realistic schemes available so that people can either continue to enjoy the homes in which they live or choose to move. For many of the people affected, the delay and the anxiety that that causes lead them to feel that they want only one option, which is repurchasing—effectively they want out.

I shall encapsulate the problems for each category of home. First, the Cornish units are more readily capable of repair, and that work is proceeding apace. However, Cannock Chase district council has acquired 10 houses on the ground of personal hardship and a further 40 are being acquired for which the cost of reinstatement, together with the cost of repair for the shale floors — which is not eligible for grant — exceed the value of the properties. Why are the shale foundations not eligible for assistance? Without the work being undertaken on the defective panels, the foundations would be adequate. I ask my hon. Friend seriously to consider including that essential repair work in the list of repairs eligible for grant under the scheme.

The second category is Wates homes, of which about 47 are in private ownership. After a long wait, there is now a real prospect of implementing a viable repair scheme. I understand that one of the leading consultants, Michael Dyson Associates, is hoping to undertake a pilot project in Tamworth with the assistance of Tarmac Construction. In the meantime, the owners are enduring a lengthy wait.

Further, despite the welcome increase in the maximum grant availability announced in August — an increase from £14,000 to £20,000—a problem arises because the quoted cost of repairs has also risen. In February owners were quoted £13,500 for repair, but that has risen in stages to between £17,000 and £19,000. The owners find that rise inexplicable. Indeed, such a figure is likely to make the value of the properties less than the cost of repair. The inevitable conclusion being drawn is that as soon as the Government raise the grant the builders will suddenly find that the cost of repairs has also risen. I cannot tell my hon. Friend where to find the solution. He has responded to pressure in the House to raise the maximum grant, but contractors have magically increased the cost of repairs to coincide with the grant. I hope that more people will come into the market, but my hon. Friend must realise that only a limited number are prepared to operate in it, despite the enormous attractions that there will be to builders and developers who undertake such work in the private and public sectors.

The Wates homes in my constituency were all owned by the National Coal Board, now British Coal. It is disposing of the properties as quickly as possible, and they are being bought at defective value by people who are sub-dividing them and renting them out. The tenants often do not provide the type of atmosphere which home owners on the estates would like. Home owners may want to reinstate their homes, but find that the former NCB property next door is no longer eligible for grant and that the new owners are interested only in packing in as many tenants as possible. As a result, the standard of the area is declining. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to say something about British Coal's future policy in that respect.

The problems concerning Smith homes are intractable. The hon. Member for West Bromwich, West (Miss Boothroyd), who is in her place, the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) and my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) have fought valiantly for the interests of this group of people. I have about 14 such owner-occupiers in my constituency. They are fed up to the back teeth with having to wait for an approved scheme. I understand that a south Wales company may have a suitable scheme. The likely cost is £24,000, however, which means that repurchase is the only option. As the scheme involves the virtual demolition of the property—it leaves the roof—and as we are a long way from achieving an approved scheme of reinstatement, which could itself exclude many detached properties, I should have thought that the solution was to give all owners the option of repurchase. The 14 properties in my constituency are detached.

Miss Betty Boothroyd (West Bromwich, West): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. He told me earlier that he would be happy if I intervened at this point. He said that many people in Smith houses would be happy if resources were made available to local authorities so that there could be repurchase. Would he press the Government on this matter? He knows that the resources are available. If they were made available to local authorities, they might repurchase Smith houses.

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Lady pre-empts my speech, but I am grateful to her.

To allow my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) to speak, I shall say nothing about Reema homes, but just invite my hon. Friend the Minister to comment on them. They are less of a problem than others.

I fully understand why the Government allocated administration of the scheme to local authorities. They undoubtedly have the necessary organisation and often owned the properties. Indeed, they were often responsible for building the defective properties, so it is no hardship for them to carry the can now. The Cornish units and Wates homes in Cannock were owned by the National Coal Board, and I understand Cannock Chase district council's slight resentment at picking up the cost of reinstating or repurchasing those homes.

It is true that the Government allocated £814,000 in the 1986-87 housing improvement allocation for Cannock Chase district council specifically to deal with its obligations under the Housing Defects Act 1984. The council is grateful for that, but its problem is that this is a demand-led area of the budget. It is a fairly reasonable Labour authority and is not like some that have been mentioned in the House. It seeks an assurance that if it is to meet its obligations under the Act—it cannot tell when they will be foisted upon it—it will not be subject to an attack by the district auditor.

Mr. John Heddle (Mid-Staffordshire): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for allowing me to intervene quickly. As he rightly said, we share the same local authority. Earlier he said that a number of people in his constituency and mine, which is adjacent, were encouraged by the Housing Act 1980 to exercise their right to buy. They did so and now find that they have an asset in which they are trapped. The properties are effectively blighted, not because the houses are inherently defective, but because they are PRC homes. They are inevitably tarred with the same brush as Airey homes—I was associated with a similar Adjournment debate in 1982—and the owners cannot sell them.

When my hon. Friend the Minister replies, will he consider the possibility of imposing on local authorities the duty to relieve people who find themselves trapped in homes which they cannot sell? Will he direct the attention of local authorities, such as the Cannock Chase district council, to cases such as that of my constituents, Mr. and Mrs. D. H. Knowles of 14 Larch Road, on the Springfield estate in Rugeley? They bought, but now cannot sell and are suffering considerable hardship because they cannot buy the property into which they wish to move. Their home, although not inherently defective, is blighted. They find themselves trapped. The Cannock Chase district council, benevolent though it is and moderate though it is in Labour party terms, finds itself unable, because my constituents have exercised the right to buy, to extend the arm of compassion in cases of hardship. When my hon. Friend the Minister replies to the excellently presented Adjournment debate of my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth), will he consider this one basic defect of definition in the Housing Defects Act?

Mr. Howarth: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend.

People who need to move face a problem and Cannock Chase district council is being slow in coming forward, partly because one of our Ministers asked it to behave in that way. Now we must ensure that the council can meet the obligations without incurring wild expenditure. I suggest that we should perhaps allow capital receipts to be released for this one specific budget area and that one alone.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Richard Tracey): Perhaps I could begin on two personal notes. First, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) on a success which he has achieved outside the House. I am sure that it will have been welcomed by all hon. Members. Secondly, I thank my hon. Friend for the warm tribute which he paid to my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) who was previously Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment and whose work we all recognise as being of a high quality. Many of us have good cause to thank him for what he has done for us in many ways.

[Mr. Richard Tracey]

I certainly wish to thank my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood for giving us this opportunity to discuss, albeit briefly, this important legislation. The interest in this matter has been shown by the interventions of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) and the hon. Member for West Bromwich, West (Miss Boothroyd) who, unfortunately, is no longer present. We are all grateful for the hon. Lady's intervention.

We agree that this was an important piece of legislation, and my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) and I first knew it as the Housing Defects Act 1984. It has now been consolidated into part XVI of the Housing Act 1985, but the substance of the Act remains unaltered by the consolidation.

My hon. Friend has, quite understandably, identified some problems with the operation of the Act. I should like to look briefly at the history of this measure because it is important to remind ourselves of why we put it on the statute book and, indeed, of the progress we are now making, nationally, with its implementation.

The story really began in 1983 when our Building Research Establishment discovered serious, and quite unexpected, problems with Airey houses. The BRE then discovered that all prefabricated reinforced concrete houses designed before 1960 faced the same type of defect. These properties therefore became unmortgageable and the owners, who had bought in good faith and with no knowledge of inherent defects, were left in a very difficult position. The Government could simply have rested on the old "caveat emptor" principle but we did not. We recognised that the Government had a responsibility to owners who had bought in good faith from the public sector and now found themselves in an impossible position.

So the Government introduced first the "Voluntary Airey Scheme" — an extension of the repairs grant system to Airey houses—and then, when the full extent of the problem became clear, the Housing Defects Act 1984. As my hon. Friend knows, this entitles eligible owners of designated properties either to a 90 per cent. local authority grant to reinstate the property, or 100 per cent. in financial hardship cases, or, if repair is not possible or cost effective, to repurchase at 95 per cent. of defect-free value. Owners can also apply for repurchase on hardship grounds. The authority has to decide the form of assistance—whether grant or repurchase—in each case.

That Act received all party support in the House. It is a generous measure which has given security to thousands of home owners who would otherwise be in desperate straits. It is important to remember this when we look at some of the difficulties—which I do not deny exist. I stress that the owners will get assistance, within the 10-year period laid down in the designations. That fact in itself is an enormous step forward for them, and we must not lose sight of it. The Government did the right thing in passing this measure and now we must all do all we can to help it work smoothly.

A further big step forward is the progress that we are now making on approved repair methods. When the Act came into operation on 1 December 1984 there were none. Now, thanks especially to the builders and designers and, of course, to the National House Building Council and its subsidiary PRC Homes Ltd., there are 21, covering seven of the designated PRC types — Airey, Cornish unit, Unity, Wates, Woolaway, Orlit and Parkinson. Some 31 more schemes are in the pipeline, including one for Reema and one for the Smith houses type, which the Government designated earlier this year. These approved methods cover two thirds of all designated houses in private ownership—and progress is continuing. My hon. Friend will also recall that we have just made, on 25 September, adjustments to the grant expenditure limits for those types, like Wates, which have been shown to cost more to repair than the original across-the-board figure of £14,000. I know that my hon. Friend is concerned that builders should not "bid up" to the new limits, and we are monitoring the position carefully. Obviously, competition on repair methods will help.

This demonstrates that the Government are committed to making the Act work—and it is now getting under way. Up to 31 March 1986, there had been over 2,000 repurchases, and only 200 or so grants. For the current year local authorities estimate that they will be able to give well over 2,000 grants, so a lot more repairs are now getting under way. In other words, what we all wanted to see—Government, local authorities and owners—repairs rather than repurchase, is beginning to happen, and we can rightly be pleased at that. I fully accept that we must not be complacent, especially about the position of those authorities, and their owners, who face particular pressures.

Dr. John G. Blackburn (Dudley, West): In my constituency, there are over 300 of these properties, and I am sure that my hon. Friend will be encouraged to know that the local authority has commenced the repurchase of properties of those who can prove that they are in financial difficulties.

Mr. Tracey: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention, and I congratulate the local authority.

I know that resources are an issue that concerns my hon. Friend, and indeed other hon. Members. The first point on which we can all agree is that the precise pattern of expenditure under the Act is not easy to predict. Owners have 10 years in which to seek assistance; and, even if large numbers apply, the cases, quite understandably, do not necessarily crystallise for quite some time. That is why my Department encourages authorities to talk with their owners to try to reach a good understanding on a likely timetable. Owners' needs, especially in hardship cases, the existence of repair methods—and possible new ones—and overall resource availability all come into this. With good will all round, sensible programmes are attainable, and beneficial both to the authority and the owners.

Of course, certain authorities face particularly heavy obligations. We do all that we can, within the housing investment programme system, to allocate resources sensibly, reflecting those needs and others. We have been flexible beyond that. Last year, certain authorities came to us and said that they simply could not cope within existing allocations. We announced, in circular 9/85, that we would provide extra resources to authorities definitely in that position. We made available an extra £37 million. In the event, for the reasons that I have described, only some £5 million was taken up. For the current year we took £30 million out of the normal generalised needs index and distributed it directly to the regional level to reflect the problems of particularly hard-hit authorities. The West Midlands received £2 million on that basis — plus the money distributed in the normal way through HIP, where we also revised the GNI indicators, to focus better on HDA obligations. We are continuing to monitor the position—the present HIP round of meetings has given my Department's regional offices a valuable update. We shall continue to do all we can.

My hon. Friend made other specific points. We have received and studied his recent letters. First is the National Coal Board estate. I understand the concerns felt by many hon. Gentlemen about this. Local authorities are responsible under the Act for providing assistance on privately owned properties. I know that this has caused concern because authorities often had no previous involvement in those estates. But a local authority has responsibility for all the residents in its area. It is not unreasonable, therefore, for the authority to be responsible for administering the housing defects scheme in the same spirit as it handles the normal improvement and repairs grants.

The Government have a part to play. That is why the Exchequer makes an increased financial contribution in these cases — 100 per cent. of the difference between price paid and defective value, rather than the usual 75 per cent. The rest of the cost will of course attract housing subsidy, in the normal way, if the authority is still eligible for that.

As my hon. Friend has said, there are some difficulties for owners of Cornish unit properties situated on shale foundations. The shale can cost £2,000 to £3,000 to repair and is not normally eligible for grant under the housing defects legislation. This is because it is a defect quite separate from the designated one of inadequate protection of the steel reinforcement in the concrete panels. I know that certain authorities have considered giving improvement grants towards these costs. Obviously, it will be for each authority to make up its mind about giving such grants for this work. There is an alternative, if the owner's circumstances warrant it, of 100 per cent. grant assistance towards eligible works under the housing defects legislation. That could go some way towards evening up the position.

Because of the brief nature of the debate and the excellent contributions from my hon. Friends, time is limited. I hope that what I have said has been helpful. I am prepared to reply further by way of letter to any points that I have not answered. On the matter of resources mentioned by my hon. Friend——

Debate to be resumed upon Tuesday 28 October at Seven o'clock.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I hope that my comments will be helpful. In my Order Paper the motion relating to the Bexley London Borough Council Bill refers to the Second Reading of the Plymouth City Council Bill. Is that correct?

Mr. Speaker: It is a printing error.

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

Anglo-Irish Agreement

1. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will make a statement on the progress of the Anglo-Irish Agreement during the summer Adjournment.

2. Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the operation to date of the Anglo-Irish Agreement.

5. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was discussed at the latest meeting held under the auspices of the Anglo-Irish Agreement.

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Tom King): During the parliamentary recess we have had one special meeting of the Intergovernmental Conference, and one regular meeting. I have placed in the Library the statements issued after each meeting. We are making progress with the better co-ordination of security co-operation, and on a range of items falling within the ambit of the conference. At the last meeting particular items included human rights, equality of opportunity in employment, economic and transport issues and the international fund.

Mr. Latham: Is my right hon. Friend aware that there are large numbers of people on this side of the water, including in this sovereign Parliament, who wish the Anglo-Irish Agreement well and who do not regard themselves as puppets of the Americans, stooges or brainwashed collaborators in trying to proceed along the road of inter-communal reconciliation.

Mr. King: I am grateful for the comments of my hon. Friend. I believe that the continuing evidence of the operation of the conference shows that there is scope for closer co-operation and that there are benefits to be gained from the objectives of the agreement, such as the reassurance of the majority community, and the reassurance of the minority, community of their rights within the Province. I make that absolutely clear. That has always been my position. That is our objective, and I believe that it is an objective that all people of good will should share.

Mr. Winnick: Is it not time that we saw some real economic improvements in Northern Ireland? Perhaps the Secretary of State will recognise the abysmal economic situation. Is the Secretary of State aware that one of the latest victims of the sectarian murders was Mr. Raymond Mooney, a young man who left behind four children? He was an active member of my union, and he was slaughtered as he came down the hall of the church where he was an active social and welfare worker. Is that not yet another illustration of the sectarian murders being carried out by gangs on both sides? Is the Secretary of State aware that on Saturday there is a trade union conference in Belfast to deal with all forms of intimidation and sectarianism? Does he wish that conference well?

Mr. King: I answer the last part of the hon. Gentleman's question with an unequivocal yes. I certainly strongly applaud the initiative of the trade unions in seeking to give a lead against sectarian intimidation and violence, from whichever quarter it may come. I hope that the whole House will join me in deploring any incidents of sectarian violence, of which, sadly, there have been far too many in recent months, and also any speeches that may tend to incite what is obviously a serious and charged situation and which all too easily can result in sectarian outrages from both sides of the community.

On the economic front, obviously such acts are a crime against the whole community in the Province if they in any way discourage employment. However, there is encouraging news of new investments in the Province, including an anouncement last week by a Japanese company of inward investment to set up a new operation. It is the second Japanese investment in the Province. That is coupled with other substantial investments in existing plants. That is an encouraging side of the picture that is not always so widely reported.

Mr. Nellist: With only three weeks to go to the anniversary of the Anglo-Irish Agreement, is not the reality of the summer months that the backlash against that agreement still continues to claim lives and that the sectarian tensions continue and do not diminsh? Is it not far more hopeful that 4,000 Department of Health and Social Security workers went on strike a few weeks ago —a united strike of Catholic and Protestant workers against intimidation — and that on Saturday the Northern Ireland committee of the Irish Congress of Trade Unions is organising a conference to unite workers? Are they not far more hopeful signs than the Anglo-Irish Agreement that workers can be united in the North against all sectarian and paramilitary groups operating in the area?

Mr. King: I applaud the way in which workers, including those in the DHSS, have refused to be intimidated by paramilitary groups and have stood against intimidation from whichever extreme it might come. The Anglo-Irish Agreement is based on exactly the twin pillars I referred to: to reassure the majority of the community of the security of their position based on the principle of consent, and to reassure the minority of their absolute entitlement to equality of treatment in Northern Ireland. It is that basis which offers the best hope for the people to come together against sectarian hatreds and terrorist violence which seek to divide the communities.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Does my right hon. Friend not understand that many of us feel that the sectarian murders and the intimidation, about which two Opposition Members have spoken, are the consequence of the Anglo-Irish Agreement? As my right hon. Friend has spoken, as Irish Ministers have spoken, of benefits to follow, how long will we have to wait for those benefits?

Mr. King: My hon. Friend knows better than anybody the history of violence in Ireland. The suggestion that sectarian killings have started since the signing of the Anglo-Irish Agreement ignores the fact that these have tragically defaced the face of Ireland for far too long. It does not do my hon. Friend credit, in view of the respect that I have for him and for his knowledge, for example, of the security situation, for him to suggest that there can be an overnight or instant improvement. He knows, and his knowledge makes it unavoidable for him to recognise this, that it will take time to get improvements in co-operation and trust between the security forces in the North and the South if we are to get that genuine improvement in security.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: What does the Secretary of State regard as the prospect for the European convention against terrorism, the ratification of which was one of the promises that accompanied the making of the agreement?

Mr. King: A debate is taking place in the Dail, the outcome of which will be significant in terms of the further progress of that ratification. I very much hope that it will go forward shortly and that we get it established. The Taoiseach and the Irish Government have made clear their commitment to do just that.

Mr. Stanbrook: Do the Government accept that the Anglo-Irish Agreement will automatically lapse on the election of a new Government in Ireland unless that Government positively accept the agreement?

Mr. King: My hon. Friend is absolutely plumb wrong. I do not know from where he gets that idea, but the agreement stands, and it is binding on successive Irish Governments, as it is binding on successive British Governments, until and unless such time as, after review, any changes might be made. My hon. Friend may have better lawyers than I have, but my advice is the opposite to the view that he appears to hold.

Mr. Mallon: I am reluctant to draw conclusions from the unfortunate deaths of people in Northern Ireland, but I feel it necessary, in the light of the previous question, to ask the Secretary of State to confirm that there have been 56 fatalities as a result of paramilitary activities in the year subsequent to the signing of the Anglo-Irish Agreement, compared to 216 in the year subsequent to the signing of the Sunningdale agreement. Will he further confirm that of the 37 people who were not members of the security forces or the Provisional IRA who were killed in that period, the majority were killed by Loyalist paramilitary groupings and that their deaths had no border connection whatsoever?

Mr. King: I can confirm those figures. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that they are tragically high and that the House will share that view. The reality is, sadly, that the number of deaths in Northern Ireland can often be almost an accident on the margin. In other words, some incidents that could be serious and lead to a serious loss of life can sometimes be prevented. By itself, that is not necessarily the sole indicator of the level of violence.

I take a serious view of, and do not underrate, the problem. I accept that the level of violence is higher than it was last year, but I recognise that this is part of the determined efforts by the two parts of the community deliberately to seek to exploit the situation. I am under no illusion but that the IRA is deliberately enhancing its campaign of violence because it fears the agreement and is seeking to excite Loyalist opposition, and the Loyalist extremists are themselves guilty of a number of serious crimes.

Mr. Hayes: Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is a growing sense of despair and frustration among many ordinary and decent Unionists at the intransigence of their elected representatives? Will he clearly warn those people who are toying with the prospect of putting the bully boys on to the streets of Belfast on the anniversary of the Hillsborough agreement that they will be worthy only of the contempt of the people whom they claim to represent?

Mr. King: I share the real concern felt about some of the methods of opposition exercised by some people in their hostility to the Anglo-Irish Agreement. I have made clear my support and belief in the Union. I believe that the Union is made more secure by the recognition of the principle of consent, that the Union cannot be affected against the wishes of a majority in Northern Ireland, and that that is accepted in the Republic as well as in the United Kingdom. My worry about the tactics being employed by some is that the threat to the Union will come more from the misguided antics of some who call themselves Loyalists than from any possible implied threat from the Anglo-Irish Agreement.

Mr. Meadowcroft: What evidence does the Secretary of State have that the Anglo-Irish Agreement is gaining greater acceptance among the people of Northern Ireland?

Mr. King: I recognise that the agreement has not obviously commanded acceptance or enthusiasm among the majority community. However, the minority community recognises the determined effort which is being made, which was part of the purpose of the Anglo-Irish Agreement, to ensure that their rights and entitlements are recognised and appreciated and that there is a proper opportunity for their views to be heard. That is understood and appreciated. I accept that there is a need for a much better understanding with the Unionist community about the merits and advantages which can flow for it out of the agreement. The present difficulty is that we cannot seek to examine the fears and concerns of people who are not prepared to talk and who are not—with one exception—even prepared to debate the issues in this sovereign Chamber of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Archer: With reference to the right hon. Gentleman's answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), does he agree that the best way to fulfil the expectations of those who welcomed the agreement because they thought it would provide redress for some of their problems, and to allay the fears of those who see the agreement as sinister, would be to demonstrate that the agreement is intended to make practical contributions to bread and butter issues? People have to eat, whatever their sectarian affiliations. Should not sensible ideas for economic co-operation now be appearing?

Mr. King: I am certainly anxious to see how, in a number of areas, we can develop such matters. For example, the hon. Gentleman will note that I referred to economic and transport issues. Transport costs is an issue which is common to the whole of the island of Ireland in terms of being competitive in world markets. There must be an efficient transport system across the Irish sea. Developments in this and other areas are being closely examined at present. We are considering both sea and air links.

USA (Extradition Treaty)

3. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on progress in the United States of America resulting from his discussions there concerning extradition of Irish Republican Army suspects wanted by the police in the United Kingdom.

Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Nicholas Scott): On 17 July the United States Senate approved the United States-United Kingdom supplementary extradition treaty by an overwhelming majority. This is an important step forward in our mutual fight against the evils of terrorism. Orders to enable the supplementary treaty to be ratified will shortly be brought before the House.

Mr. Adley: Does my hon. Friend agree that this is a matter for congratulation for the Administrations on both sides of the Atlantic? Is this success not epitomised by the extradition to this country of William Quinn? Can my hon. Friend confirm that this is the first time that a terrorist suspect has been extradited to this country? Will my hon. Friend please make sure that good care is taken of the documentation and administration so that the police work on both sides of the Atlantic is not frustrated?

Mr. Scott: I can give my hon. Friend the assurance that he sought in the last part of his question. I am sure that the House will welcome the vote in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and in the full Senate, where the treaty attracted widespread and bipartisan support. The House should recognise that the passage of the supplementary treaty demonstrates the value of the very closest bilateral and multilateral co-operation in the fight against terrorism. I welcome the fact that that is going beyond the transatlantic concept. Wider co-operation will improve everyone's chances of defeating terrorism in the long run.

Mr. Dickens: Does my hon. Friend welcome the co-operation of the Dutch authorities in their moves towards the extradition of MacFarland and Kelly, the two prisoners who excaped from the Maze prison?

Mr. Scott: The whole House will welcome the decision of the Dutch courts. The judgment is complex and we are studying it very carefully. Co-operation with the Dutch authorities in this matter has been excellent, and they have made a considerable contribution towards improving international co-operation against terrorism.

Security

4. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on security in Northern Ireland.

9. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the current security situation within the Province.

Mr. Tom King: Since I last answered questions in the House on 3 July, 16 civilians and nine members of the security forces have died in incidents arising from the security situation. But for the courage and dedication of members of the security forces, and the public-spirited actions of a number of civilians, these tragic totals would have been even greater.

The unstinting efforts of the security forces continue to achieve results. So far this year 521 people have been charged with serious offences and 170 weapons, 15,700 rounds of ammunition, and 3,400 lb of explosives have been recovered.

Mr. Proctor: As co-chairman of the Anglo-Irish Conference, will my right hon. Friend say whether there is any validity in Dr. FitzGerald's claim that evidence to have been given against alleged terrorists by Angela Whorisky was withdrawn by the Director of Public Prosecutions because of representations that Dr. FitzGerald had made in the Anglo-Irish Conference? Will he confirm that Angela Whorisky did not herself withdraw any evidence and that the Irish Republic has now been given the right to interfere in the judicial proceedings of Northern Ireland?

Mr. King: In response to my hon. Friend's last point, of course not. Certainly no Irish Minister or the Taoiseach would dream of claiming any such thing. Any individual case is a matter for the Law Officers and the prosecuting authorities. My right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General has issued a statement in this connection.

Mr. McNamara: Will the Secretary of State confirm that the figures that his Department gave me about increases in violence arising in the 11 months after the signing of the Anglo-Irish accord compared with the figures for violence in the 12 months before the Anglo-Irish accord show that, apart from injuries, there has been no real significant increase and that there has been a marked decrease in the number of shootings and bombings? Therefore, in spite of the hysteria from the extreme Provisionals and the extreme Unionists, one is able to say that there has been no real material worsening of the security position as a result of the accord and that there has been a marked improvement in respect of the finding of bombs, caches and so on.

Mr. King: As is well known, the figure for killings is about the same this year as it was for the whole of last year, but, against that, it is very much lower than some years ago. I take no comfort from that, because I know that the whole House will share my view that the figures are far too high. The hon. Gentleman is right about the success of the security forces. The House may be aware of the recovery of some very dangerous weapons indeed only in recent days. There has also been success in recovering a certain amount of explosives and weapons.

Ms. Clare Short: Will the Secretary of State confirm that the big increase in violence since the Anglo-Irish Agreement has been in the number of sectarian assassinations by Loyalist paramilitaries? On the general security situation, what information is he willing to share with us about links between elected Loyalist politicians who are represented in this House and those paramilitary organisations? For example, at the Bingham funeral of a man who was buried with full UVF paraphernalia on his coffin, members of the Democratic Unionist party had called at his house and openly shown support for that kind of paramilitary activity. When will the right hon. Gentleman denounce that as even handedly as he denounces Sinn Fein politicians?

Mr. King: I have done that on a number of occasions. The hon. Lady is fair and she will know that on previous occasions I have deplored the fact that there are any hon. Members in this House who have any association whatsoever with paramilitary activities. I have made that absolutely clear. The House will be aware that there have been a number of serious incidents, including a number of serious paramilitary incidents and incitement to sectarian violence. Although there has been such an increase, there is no question but that the IRA views the Anglo-Irish Agreement as a great threat to its activities. The co-operation of the British and Irish Governments in this connection is a threat to the IRA. There is no doubt that it is seeking to escalate violence and to destroy the agreement. Some people try to oppose the agreement because they do not understand what it means. The IRA is seeking to oppose the agreement because it understands all too well what it means.

Marches

7. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the policing of marches in the Province during the summer months.

Mr. Scott: I am sure the whole House will recognise that the Royal Ulster Constabulary's skilful and highly professional handling of the very large number of marches during what was undoubtedly a tense period in the Province proved very successful. I am sure the House would wish to congratulate it on its efforts, which, coupled with the restraint and good sense of the overwhelming majority of the community, ensured that almost all parades passed off without serious incident.

Mr. Bruinvels: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his new position. Although I recognise that there is a need for a large number of these marches, I am sure my hon. Friend would agree that there has been a tremendous strain on the police forces throughout the summer. They have not been helped by the "Troops out of Northern Ireland" group campaigning in this country, and Sinn Fein councillors, both in Northern Ireland and in some areas of Britain, doing their best to undermine what is happening.

Does my hon. Friend agree that the police need everyone's support? There should be far better co-operation over the arrangements for future marches. The number of marches should be limited to ensure that the Province is adequately policed throughout the summer and in other months.

Mr. Scott: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind remarks. I agree very much with the thrust of his questions. We ought to bear in mind that rather more than 2,000 parades took place in Northern Ireland during the marching season, and that only 70 resulted in any sort of disorder. I very much agree that the need to police these parades, especially when there is a threat of violence, diverts police resources from their main task of maintaining law and order and their continuing battle against terrorism. I urge everyone to co-operate as fully as possible with the police in these matters.

Mr. Duffy: Does the Minister agree that the job of policing such sensitively and provocatively routed marches into Catholic areas as took place in Portadown in July would be eased if the RUC's responsible approach to the parade had been matched by that of the organisers? Some of the Unionist Members who normally sit on the Bench to my left, notably the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) publicly endorsed at that time a well-known troublemaker, Mr. Seawright, who believes that all Catholics should be incinerated, even though the RUC felt obliged to ban him from that parade.

Mr. Scott: It is incumbent upon everyone in Northern Ireland involved in these types of parades to co-operate fully with the police. I hope that we can move towards a situation in Northern Ireland where it is accepted that people do not march in areas where they are not welcome. That is a principle we should seek to estabiish. It would also be helpful to the police if those who organise Republican marches in Northern Ireland would give proper notice of them and co-operate with the police.

Anglo-Irish Agreement

8. Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what recent discussions he has had with representatives of policial parties in Northen Ireland concerning the form and progress of the Anglo-Irish Agreement.

Mr. Tom King: I and my hon. Friend the Minister of State have met the leaders of the Social Democratic and Labour party and the Alliance party for that purpose on a number of occasions. As I have repeatedly said, we should like to have discussions with representatives of Unionist parties too, but unfortunately they have not yet felt able to do so.

Mr. Maclennan: In answer to an earlier question the Secretary of State spoke of progress on human rights being made under the agreement with the Irish Government. Has he thought it right to put forward the proposals of the Official Unionists that there should be a Bill of Rights in Northern Ireland, or the proposal of the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights that the European convention on human rights should be incorporated into the law of the land to give a remedy in our courts?

Mr. King: We have made it clear that we see real difficulties about a Bill of Rights, because inevitably it would involve the whole of the United Kingdom, with all the problems that that might entail, and the connected issues, which have often been debated. At the most recent conference we said that it might be helpful to have a joint declaration on human righs, which might be an affirmation by both Governments. The matter is being studied at present.

Mr. Gow: Has my right hon. Friend seen the text of the speech made by Mr. Charles Haughey at Bodenstown on the 12th of this month, in which he said that in the 12 months since the Anglo-Irish Agreement had been signed the position of Nationalists in the North had seriously worsened? In the discussions to which my right hon. Friend has just referred, have any representations of the sort made by Mr. Charles Haughey been made by the SDLP and other parties in the North?

Mr. King: No, Sir. I have seen Mr. Charles Haughey's comments as well as the comments of many Nationalists, who clearly do not share that view.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that no self-respecting Member of this House would accept a situation in which the representation of the rights and interests of a section of his constituents is vested by international treaty in a foreign power?

Mr. King: That is simply not true, if I may say so to the right hon. Gentleman, whom I would have expected to be more accurate in the matter. To imply that those rights and interests are vested without the opportunity to put forward views, something which in no way deprives others of the opportunity to put forward views — as if the rights had been permanently transferred — is total distortion and an incorrect interpretation of that agreement.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson: Can my right hon. Friend say whether, in the event of a change of Government in the Republic, the Anglo-Irish Agreement could be renegotiated and, if so, whether in that process all the political parties in the North could be included in the negotiation?

Mr. King: The agreement itself provides for the opportunity for review, which would be after three years, or earlier at the request of either party. Obviously any review would be conducted between Governments, but, as I have made clear, I would envisage the opportunity to be there for anybody who wished to do so to put forward any views that he liked. That opportunity exists now, and I am sorry that the Unionist party has not felt able to take advantage of it.

Security

10. Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he will next be meeting the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary to discuss security matters.

Mr. Tom King: I have regular meetings with the Chief Constable and the General Officer Commanding in Northern Ireland to discuss policy issues of common concern in the security field. It is not my practice to give details of the timing of those meetings.

Mr. McNamara: Can the Secretary of State inform the House whether at those meetings he discussed with the Chief Constable the orders given to special branches of the RUC about a shoot-to-kill policy in border areas, orders given to members of the RUC to lie at public trials, orders given to members of the RUC to make incursions into the territory of the Republic of Ireland, or the decision of the Chief Constable to refuse to give Mr. Stalker either the tape or transcript of the tape of what took place in the shootings in that barn? Will the right hon. Gentleman bear in mind that even though criminal actions may be brought against individuals on that matter, it does not exonerate the Government from coming to the House and giving a full, frank statement of all that occurred when those matters are outwith particular circumstances in Northern Ireland but concern the rule of law in the whole kingdom?

Mr. King: The hon. Member asks me about meetings with the Chief Constable. There is a specific question on the Order Paper relating to the Sampson-Stalker report, which will be dealt with shortly.

Mr. McQuarrie: When my right hon. Friend meets the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, will he take the opportunity to look at the files on security in past years with a view to gaining information for the future with particular reference to the comments that have been attributed to the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) in respect of the assassination of Airey Neave and the right hon. Gentleman's comment that outside forces were perhaps responsible for that assassination?

Mr. King: The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) will have to answer for his own statements. All I would say is that I know that this is not the first time that he has sought to advance this particular conspiracy theory.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: When the Secretary of State next meets the Chief Constable, will he update him on the work that is being done both in his Department and in the Home Department relating to the availability of kidnap insurance? Inquiries are taking place, but what has happened during the parliamentary recess? We were told that some initiative would be taken this year. Where are we in the debate?

Mr. King: As the hon. Gentleman knows, this is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, and I should be grateful if he would address his question to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Archer: Will the right hon. Gentleman, with his usual fairness, agree that the Opposition have been at pains throughout the Stalker episode not to overdramatise it? But has there not been an accumulation in responsible newspapers of allegations which, if they are true, cannot be condoned by the authorities of a civilised country and which, if they are false, ought to be laid to rest? In view of the call from the National Council for Civil Liberties and Amnesty International for a full inquiry, is it not clear that to ignore the situation will not make it go away? Until the poison is removed, must it not continue to fester?

Mr. King: In view of the seriousness of the point that has been raised, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the House will forgive me if I give perhaps a rather fuller reply to the question of the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

I am informed that the first part of the report of the inquiry that was begun by Mr. Stalker and completed by Mr. Sampson was submitted by the latter to the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary yesterday. The Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland has also received a copy. I understand that this part of the report covers the incident on 24 November 1982 in which Mr. Michael Tighe was shot dead. Also, I understand that Mr. Sampson hopes to submit as soon as possible a second part, which will address the associated issues connected with all the cases that are under investigation. As is the usual practice with police reports covering criminal investigations, it will not be published. On the basis of Mr. Sampson's report, along with any comments from the Chief Constable, the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland will decide what directions to give as to criminal proceedings.

The Attorney-General has requested the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland to inform him fully with regard to the facts reported to the Director of Public Prosecutions and to consult the Attorney-General before any directions are given. An additional section of Mr. Sampson's report will deal with matters concerning the management of the Royal Ulster Constabulary.

I propose to make a statement to the House on these aspects at the earliest opportunity. It will, however, be understood that I have no role in the conduct of criminal proceedings, nor would it be appropriate for any comments to be made upon the individual investigations involved until all such proceedings are completed.

Mr. Mallon: Will the Secretary of State confirm that when the three incidents took place, which are now known as the shoot-to-kill incidents that were investigated by Mr. Stalker and Mr. Sampson, the Chief Constable of Northern Ireland was absent from Northern Ireland during two of those incidents, although the situation was very tense, and that during all three incidents the head of the CID in Northern Ireland was absent from Northern Ireland? Will the Secretary of State inform the House of where the ultimate responsibility lies when something goes terribly wrong in a police service that is under a cloud of conspiracy such as this?

Mr. King: The House will know, as I sought to make clear in my earlier reply, that I cannot comment on the criminal or disciplinary aspects of this inquiry. I have made it clear to the House that the first section of Mr. Sampson's report was delivered yesterday to the Chief Constable, with a copy to the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland. That is the first step. I have also made clear the action that I will seek to take to keep the House informed on these matters of public interest.

Community Groups

11. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the current status of funding of community groups previously funded by the Belfast city council; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Dr. Brian Mawhinney): Action by a Government-appointed commissioner on 8 October released city council funds to community groups in Belfast for the rest of the current financial year. I regret that this action became necessary as a result of the non-co-operative attitude of a majority of the Unionist councillors on Belfast city council.

Mr. Flannery: Is it not a fact that there are about 40 of those voluntary community groups and that the Government knew in advance that the Unionists would refuse to service people because of the Anglo-Irish Agreement, and that people are losing their jobs in those groups? Is it not a fact also that the Government knew well in advance that the money had run out, yet they were tardy in giving money to those groups? May we have an assurance that that will not occur again?

Dr. Mawhinney: No, I could not accept that. The responsibility for funding such groups remains with the Belfast city council. Therefore, the Government could not act until it became clear, after the end of September, that the council was not going to act. I can confirm that the action of the Commission on Housing has involved authorising running costs for 41 groups involving grants totalling £395,815.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 23 October.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today. Following Questions in the House I shall be going to sign the book of condolence opened for President Machel of Mozambique.

Mr. Thorne: Will my right hon. Friend find time to reaffirm her Government's commitment to abhorring violence in Northern Ireland and to condemn the action of three local authorities in London which have entertained Sinn Fein, the political wing of the IRA, this week—Haringey on Monday, Lambeth on Tuesday and Hackney last night, all of which, needless to say, are Labour-controlled local authorities?

The Prime Minister: We utterly condemn violence in Northern Ireland and do everything we can do to eradicate it. I join my hon. Friend in completely deploring invitations to any organisation which supports or perpetrates violence and therefore gives a platform to those who advocate violence. We think that that is completely wrong, and I agree with my hon. Friend.

Mr. Kinnock: I firmly associate myself with the view that the Prime Minister expressed concerning violence in pursuit of all ends, including political ends, and say that those who have the immense dishonesty to fight with a ballot box in one hand and a rifle in the other have no place in democratic politics.

While this month's balance of payments statistics show some welcome improvement on last month's disastrous figures, they still reveal that we have been in deficit this year for the first time since we started to receive oil money, and they further record manufacturing trade figures that are the worst in all history. Does the Prime Minister really think that she can combat that grave position by raising interest rates, raising industrial costs and increasing home payments, since that appears to be the only economic policy she has?

The Prime Minister: Certainly the balance of trade figures published today are better than those for last month. The right hon. Gentleman will have noticed that exports have risen, which is good. One of the problems of securing a good balance of payments, especially on current account, is that of keeping unit costs down. The biggest aggravating factor for unit costs is unit wage costs, which, in this country, are rising faster than elsewhere. That is a matter to which I hope the right hon. Gentleman and the trade unions will give their attention and not seek to get more out in wages than is put in in productivity.

Mr. Kinnock: Is the Prime Minister announcing her intention to establish some form of incomes control policy, contrary to everything that she has ever said, or will she concentrate on the basic causes of our loss of 27 per cent. in competitiveness over the past seven years, which have been the restrictions on demand and the massive costs that she has imposed on industry by a permanent policy of high interest rates?

The Prime Minister: How does the right hon. Gentleman explain the first part of his question when he then says that there are restrictions on demand? There are greatly increased imports because there are no restrictions on imports.

Q2. Mr. Amess asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 23 October.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Amess: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the rate support grant settlement is such that those local authorities which manage their affairs prudently will be able to keep any rate increases low? Will she also join me in welcoming the fact that the Labour party has just lost control of Basildon district council because of the resignation of Labour councillors concerned about imprudent spending and the political posturing of local authorities such as Brent, Haringey, Hackney and Lambeth?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend knows, this year's rate support grant settlement is generous and he will be well aware that the Local Authority Audit Commission has given examples of ways of making local authorities much more efficient. I congratulate Basildon on what has happened and I am sure that it will be beneficial to all ratepayers.

Mr. Steel: Is the Prime Minister aware that the Government's own report — [Interruption] — to the regional development commissioner of the European Commission stated clearly that the prospects for reducing unemployment were "frighteningly bleak"? In view of that, how can she continue to announce cuts in railway, local authority and housing expenditure in the very areas of the country which the report ackowledges need extra help?

The Prime Minister: With regard to the figures in the European regional development fund application, the unemployment totals on which the report is based are taken from the 1986 public expenditure White Paper. They are assumptions, not forecasts or predictions, and they follow the same practice as that adopted by the Labour Government. Figures for the individual regions assume that the existing regional pattern of unemployment continues. As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, the Government's record on infrastructure expenditure is far better than that of the Government whom he supported.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: Will the Prime Minister explain the Government's monetary policy? The City of London does not understand it, financial commentators do not understand it and now even the Governor of the Bank of England does not seem to understand it. Will she explain it?

The Prime Minister: If the right hon. Gentleman will give me longer than I have at Question Time, I will do so gladly. I do not think that other people are as ignorant as he seems to think. The monetary policy is to keep downward pressure on inflation. I remind the right hon. Gentleman that inflation is far lower than any level that his Government ever managed to achieve.

Q3. Mrs. McCurley asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 23 October.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. McCurley: Following my right hon. Friend's successful visit to Barrow and Furness in September, where she laid down the keel for the new submarine for Trident, can she reaffirm the Government's commitment to a nuclear defence policy with Trident as its base? Would she care to comment on the fact that no amount of games down on the farm with Roget's Thesaurus can remedy a weak and discredited alliance policy?

The Prime Minister: I reaffirm our independent nuclear deterrent policy and that Trident will come into operation. The first submarine is now being built at Vickers yard in Barrow and Furness. I agree with my hon. Friend about the policies of certain other parties. I do not believe that the British people will take seriously a political party which, on a subject as important as the British deterrent, claims that it is committed to maintaining it, but cannot agree on how to do so.

Mr. Chris Smith: Can the Prime Minister tell us, in relation to her earlier answer on the regional report to the EEC, what precisely is the difference between an assumption and a forecast or prediction?

The Prime Minister: If the hon. Gentleman looks at the public expenditure surveys he will see that we never make forecasts for successive years. We do the best that we can with the immediately following year and then, in the years after that, the present figure automatically continues. That has been the practice and it was first announced in 1978 by the Government whom the hon. Member supported.

Mr. Cormack: Will my right hon. friend seek an opportunity, today if possible, to see the remarkably moving and accurate film "Cry Hungary" which the BBC screened last night? Is this not an appropriate moment to remind people throughout the free world that no country under the domination of the Soviet Union has had the opportunity to opt even for neutrality?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I agree with my hon. Friend. We should all recall that, I believe, 30 years ago today, the Soviet tanks rolled in and crushed the attempts of the Hungarian people to gain for themselves some greater freedom. I hope that we shall remember it vividly, be grateful for our liberty and be determined to defend it, as this Government are.

Q4. Mr. Wareing asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 23 October.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Wareing: The right hon. Lady will appreciate that one of the factors causing a deficit in our balance of payments is Britain's loss in trade in terms of shipping. In 1979, when the right hon. Lady became Prime Minister, we had 1,200 vessels, and now we are down to about 600. At that time we had 80,000 seafaring jobs and now we are down to 40,000. Will the right hon. Lady now tell us what she and her Government will do about that?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is aware that one of the problems with shipbuilding the world over is that every country has given shipbuilding so many subsidies—[HON. MEMBERS: "Shipping."] I will come on to shipping. There have been so many subsidies that there are now two years' supplies of ships swinging on the buoys. With regard to shipping, one of the problems is that the National Union of Seamen has priced itself out of the market—[Interruption.] Hon. Gentlemen always react in the same way to the truth. The NUS has priced itself out of employment. Consequently, the work has gone elsewhere, and that is a tragedy, I agree. The remedy lies in its hands.

Mr. Greenway: Does my right hon. Friend share my concern for my constituent, Miss Maureen McGoldrick, and the children in her care in a Brent school? The governors of the school have found her totally innocent of accusations of racism, as has the High Court, yet Brent Labour council insists on persecuting her, to the great detriment of her school, the children and their parents.

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend makes his point effectively. I believe I am right in saying that an appeal has been entered and, therefore, I am circumscribed in what I can say.

Q8. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 23 October.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago and have given several times since.

Mr. Bennett: Does the Prime Minister recall that when she was Secretary of State for Education and Science she made a series of speeches in favour of nursery education? For almost 10 years after that nursery education in Britain was steadily expanded. It now appears that the Government have abandoned all plans to improve Britain's nursery education. What steps will she take to discuss with Ministers with responsibility for education ways in which we can try to achieve the same sort of nursery provision as the French?

The Prime Minister: I am so pleased that the hon. Gentleman managed to get his question in. I am very keen on nursery education. Since January 1979 the proportion of three and four-year-olds at school has increased from 37 to 43 per cent. in January 1986.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Has my right hon. Friend seen the Labour party's new booklet about public investment? It is on sale at some newsagents, but, not surprisingly, it has failed to make the bestseller list——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Prime Minister can only reply to questions for which she has responsibility.

Mr. Wardle: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Labour party—[Interruption.]—is as bereft of sound financial policies in 1986 as it was in 1976?

The Prime Minister: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Donald Stewart: Is the Prime Minister aware that our merchant fleet has shrunk because, unlike the British Government, which is indifferent, our competitors assist their merchant navies? If the right hon. Lady is not aware of the consequences for trade and industry, will she at least bear in mind what will happen to the defence of this country if our Merchant Navy is not given assistance?

The Prime Minister: Obviously we are considering that very carefully, but the main problem is that the National Union of Seamen has demanded salaries and restrictive practices that have priced its members out of British shipping. That is very damaging for our shipping.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, which arises out of questions.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear it after the private notice question.

NATO Ministers (Meeting)

3.32 pm

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the NATO Ministers' meeting held at Gleneagles.

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. John Stanley): At the NATO nuclear planning group meeting at Gleneagles on 21 and 22 October, NATO Defence Ministers had wide-ranging discussions on arms control and defence matters.

The Ministers extended their warm appreciation to the President of the United States on his conduct of the talks at Reykjavik and fully endorsed his bold attempt to seek far-reaching arms control agreements with the Soviet Union. They expressed their continued support for the efforts of the United States and the United Kingdom to maintain the effectiveness and credibility of their nuclear deterrent capabilities.

The Ministers remain deeply concerned about continuing Soviet efforts to upgrade and expand their military capabilities across the board. They noted with particular concern Soviet efforts involving the full range of strategic forces, shorter and longer range intermediate nuclear forces, and short-range nuclear forces, including artillery. They also noted with concern the major Soviet effort in continuing improvements in strategic and tactical anti-missile systems.

The Ministers reviewed a number of issues and nuclear-related programmes and reconfirmed our policy and planning related to NATO's nuclear forces. They agreed that both the force structure itself and the conceptual planning underpinning it are essential components for maintaining a credible deterrent posture.

A copy of the official communiqué of the Gleneagles meeting has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Davies: I thank the Minister for his reply. However, we think it very remiss of the Secretary of State not to answer, or come to the House to explain the consequences of a very important meeting. Moreover, the Minister did not volunteer a statement. We had to drag a statement out of Ministers by means of a private notice question.

Will the Minister answer three questions? First, on intermediate missiles, will he confirm that the Government still fully support the zero option? It was, I believe, agreed by NATO five years ago at Gleneagles and means that, provided that the Russians remove all their SS20s from Europe, NATO will remove all cruise and Pershing 2 missiles. Will the Minister assure the House that there will be no back sliding on the zero option or an attempt to link it with short-range missiles in central Europe?

Secondly, will the Minister tell us whether the Government fully support the offer made by President Reagan at Reykjavik to eliminate all strategic nuclear weapons within 10 years? As the Government apparently had a say in the negotiating brief for Reykjavik, I take it that they fully support that offer.

Thirdly, on the SDI and the anti-ballistic missile treaty, will the Minister tell us which interpretation the Government support? Do they say that only laboratory research is allowable under the treaty or do they believe that the testing of laser beams and shooting down rockets with rockets in the atmosphere is allowed under the treaty?

Mr. Stanley: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State much regrets that he is not able to make the statement in person, but he has a long-standing official commitment in Barrow in Furness—[Interruption.] On this side of the House we welcome ministerial attention in Barrow in Furness.

As for not volunteering a statement, the right hon. Member of Llanelli (Mr. Davies) will know that it has been normal practice over a considerable period to place copies of official communiqués in the Library.

I can certainly confirm that it is the Government's position that we should seek the INF zero option or equal numbers above zero, subject, of course, to effective verification procedures and the necessary agreement on collateral constraints on the shorter-range systems.

On the right hon. Gentleman's second question about the elimination of strategic nuclear weapons, the Government's position is as we have always stated it. There is obviously a direct relationship between major reductions in strategic nuclear forces and conventional forces and it is essential that the two are seen together.

On the right hon. Gentleman's point about the ABM, treaty, he will be aware that we are not a party to that treaty, but the Government's position is that there should be conformity with the ABM treaty.

Sir Peter Blaker (Blackpool, South): Was it not formerly the position of the Soviet Union that an agreement on intermediate range nuclear forces in Europe could be made without its being linked to an agreement on the SDI? Has the Soviet Union changed that position? If so, is not that rather regrettable?

Mr. Stanley: It was our understanding that the Soviet Union had agreed to make an INF agreement free standing, but it appears to have gone back on that position at Reykjavik. We very much regret that fact and believe that we should strive to make a free-standing INF agreement.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): As Europe has every reason to be concerned about Soviet conventional superiority and about battlefield nuclear weapons, why do the Government not point out to President Reagan that it would be far better if the SDI were kept in a laboratory, especially as the Soviets are so concerned about SDI that they would be prepared to pay a much higher price to stop it and might be persuaded to include in that price the very reductions that are essential to Europe's security?

Mr. Stanley: I am sure that the hon. Member knows that the SDI is only a research programme and that it follows on the heels of a very extensive and long-standing research programme by the Soviet Union into ABM systems.

Mr. Reg Prentice (Daventry): May I press my right hon. Friend to say a little more about the zero option and suggest that at least in parallel with that option there should be a search for mutual reductions in shorter-range nuclear weapons and conventional weapons? Otherwise, there will seem to many of us to be much validity in the doubts attributed to General Rogers that we may become more vulnerable if intermediate weapons are removed without other reductions.

Mr. Stanley: I assure my right hon. Friend that, as I said in answer to a previous question, we are fully apprised of that point. It has been a long-standing element of the NATO position that agreement on long-range INF systems must be coupled with collateral constraints on shorter-range systems.

Mr. A. E. P. Duffy (Sheffield, Attercliffe): May I draw the Minister's attention to a report in today's issue of The Guardian which says that his right hon. Friend said that if an INF deal could be achieved that would be fine? There is no mention of any linkages to the SS21s, SS22s, SS23s, or Scud or even short battlefield systems. The Minister has heard the anxiety expressed by his right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) and he murmured a qualification to my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies).

It is important that the House receives clarification about how conditional is the Secretary of State's position on the zero option. Is it really a zero option or are there further qualifications?

Mr. Stanley: I do not think I can add to what I have already said. It has been a long-standing position of the West that we should try to go for the zero option, but at the time when the zero option was made it was made clear that if it was not possible to negotiate zero-zero on both sides, it would be better to have equal numbers on both sides and reduce the large number of SS20 deployments which face the West.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it would have been extremely unwise for President Reagan to give in on SDI, especially since the Russians have been making enormous progress in outer space with their longstay platforms and in the light of the point that he has made that the Russians are known to have carried out significant research in SDI?

Mr. Stanley: My hon. Friend's point is entirely valid. The American SDI research programme has to be seen in relation to the extensive and long-standing programme that has been conducted by the Soviet Union. If the American Administration had not persevered with the SDI research programme I doubt very much whether we would have under way the most comprehensive and radical arms control negotiations that have taken place for many years.

Mr. Denis Healey (Leeds, East): Torpedoed by SDI.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Could we return to the important but unanswered third question asked by my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies)? Does the Minister's phrase "in conformity with the ABM treaty" mean that it is simply the interpretation of the Government's laboratory testing or, as my right hon. Friend says, is it laser rocket with laser rocket? Which is it? The Government surely have a view on that.

Mr. Stanley: The Government were not and are not a party to the ABM treaty and for that reason the detailed matter of interpretation is not a matter for this Administration. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh".] My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has made it clear that we attach great importance to the maintenance of the ABM treaty.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): Does my right hon. Friend accept that the United States SDI programme is a trump card in the hands of the West and that even the threat that the United States will overtake the Soviet SDI programme has brought the Soviets to the negotiating table for the first time in decades to talk seriously about disarmament? Does my right hon. Friend not also feel that President Reagan played that card correctly at Reykjavik by not yielding to the first offers from the Soviet Union and that the Soviets are likely to be back again with far more far-reaching and effective offers?

Mr. Stanley: I agree with the broad thrust of my hon. Friend's remarks. If the United States simply abandons this research programme it would set the arms control process back rather than take it forward.

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): Did the Ministers have before them the paper on general political guidelines and did they accept that paper? If they did, does that make it clear that decisions taken inside NATO, including those about disarmament and the acceptability of disarmament proposals, lie completely within the scope of the elected political leaders of NATO and not within the scope of the chiefs of staff?

Mr. Stanley: Yes, I can certainly give the hon. Gentleman the confirmation that he seeks. The updating of the general political guidelines has not meant any reduction whatever in political control.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Since the cruise missile programme remains an essential element of NATO defence, was there any discussion at the wide-ranging Gleneagles talks about the security of these missile sites? Secondly, does my right hon. Friend agree that the security of those sites is so important that responsibility for it should be a national rather than a local matter?

Mr. Stanley: I can certainly tell my hon. Friend that the security of nuclear weapons is regularly considered within NATO and is also considered by the Nuclear Planning Group. I appreciate my hon. Friend's anxiety about responsibility for that security and the local financial burden. I know that those are matters that he has pursued with my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, who has sought to make an equitable arrangement to ensure that local ratepayers do not face a particular burden as a result of the arrangement at Molesworth.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a private notice question, and therefore an extension of Question Time. I shall take one more question from each side.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Does the Minister concede that one of the thrusts put by the United States for SDI was the fact that the Soviets were allegedly breaching the ABM treaty relating to radar equipment and so on? Therefore, the United States had an interpretation of that treaty.

Do the Government now accept that as it was wrong for the Soviets to breach the treaty, it would be more than equally wrong for the United States to do so by testing weapons in space? In view of the sympathy that some Opposition Members have expressed on our relationship with the French, will the right hon. Gentleman indicate whether the French are now willing to join the integrated command structure of NATO?

Mr. Stanley: I can certainly confirm that we would not wish the treaty to be breached. We are very much aware of the concern expressed by the United States about the Soviet violations.

On the hon. Gentleman's opening point, I must put it to him that the impetus behind the SDI stemmed not so much from concern about Soviet violations, but very much from an understanding of the scale, length and implications of a very long-standing intense Soviet research programme into trying to create a possible anti-ballistic missile system breakout.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): Was the impact of the unilateral nuclear proposals of the Labour party on NATO strategy discussed?

Mr. Stanley: I do not believe that such party political matters were discussed in that forum. However, as my hon. Friend is well aware, there is very widespread concern in many NATO countries about the serious way in which the official policies of the Opposition would undermine NATO.

Business of the House

3.47 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I ask the Leader of the House to state the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 27 OCTOBER — Until seven o'clock Opposition Day (18th Allotted Day, 2nd part). There will be a debate on a motion on regional policy in the names of the leaders of the Scottish National party and Plaid Cymru.

Motions relating to the statements of changes in immigration rules (Cmnd. 9914 and House of Commons Paper No. 584).

TUESDAY 28 OCTOBER — Until seven o'clock, motion on the Deacons (Ordination of Women) Measure.

Motion on the British Railways Board (Increase of Compensation) Order.

The Chairman of Ways and Means has named opposed private business for consideration at seven o'clock.

WEDNESDAY 29 OCTOBER — There will be a debate on Westland plc on a motion for the Adjournment of the House. Details of relevant documents will be given in the Official Report.

Afterwards, there will be a debate on EC document 4554/79 relating to commercial agents. Details will be given in the Official Report.

THURSDAY 30 OCTOBER AND FRIDAY 31 OCTOBER — Consideration of any Lords amendments which may be received to the Financial Services Bill.

MONDAY 3 NOVEMBER — Consideration of any Lords amendments which may be received to the Housing and Planning Bill.

[Relevant documents debate on 29 October: Third report from the Defence Committee 1985-86 — "The Defence Implications of the Future of Westland plc" — House of Commons Paper No. 518, published on Thursday 24 July; fourth report from the Defence Committee 1985-86 — "Westland plc: The Government's Decision Making" — House of Commons paper No. 519, published on Thursday 24 July; Government response to the third and fourth reports from the Defence Committee Session 1985-86, HC 518 and 519, Cmnd. 9916, published on Monday 13 October.

Debate on Wednesday 29 October; European Document 4554/79, "Self employed commercial agents"; reports of European Legislation Committee HC 10-xx (1978-79) para. 10, HC 21-xxv (1985-86) para. 1.]

Mr. Kinnock: Next Monday the House will have the opportunity to debate the changes in immigration rules, which my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) rightly described as humiliating for visitors and shaming for this country's reputation. The wholly inadequate time that the Government have allocated to debate these serious matters has impelled us to allocate Opposition time as a matter of duty. Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that in that debate it will be in order for hon. Members to raise the matter of representation to the Home Secretary on individual cases?

Will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that a full statement is made to the House about the Government's assessment of the outcome of the superpowers meeting in

[Mr. Kinnock]

Reykjavik and its subsequent ramifications for international arms reduction and control? A statement on the summit was made in the House of Lords on 15 October. However, we have still not heard anything directly or formally on the matter in the House of Commons. I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman would be willing to repair that deficiency.

The rise in interest rates, which has been followed by rises in mortgage rates, is obviously bad news for people and businesses in this country. Is there to be a statement to the House on the matter or is the Chancellor too afraid to face the House with the consequence of his own policies?

Mr. Biffen: The Chancellor will be making an autumn statement and the matters could arise on that.

Mr. Kinnock: It may be deep winter by then, John.

Mr. Biffen: I must not be tempted, especially this soon after our return, to make any incautious comment.

We might look at the Reykjavik meeting through the usual channels. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will appreciate that it was a meeting of the greatest significance and also one of some fading memory.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank the right hon. Gentleman for the co-operation that has been afforded over time for the debate next Monday on immigration rules. It is my judgment, clearly subject to that of the Chair, that it should be perfectly possibly to deal with the issue of Members' representations.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Is my right hon. Friend suggesting that he wants to fit a second order in on Tuesday afternoon before 7 o'clock after the Deacons (Ordination of Women) Measure? If so, I think that he should take some soundings, because he is likely to find that order more controversial than he might have thought.

Mr. Biffen: Yes, and I gather that the Church militant might become controversial. The normal interpretation of the opaque language used on these occasions is that the motion on the British Railways Board (Increase of Compensation) Order is likely to arise at 10 o'clock.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Following the publication of the Department of Trade and Industry's regional development programme, does the Leader of the House agree that it is time that there was a series of debates looking at the problems of those regions, especially the economic black spots? Given that there is high crime, high unemployment and bad housing in the county of Merseyside, does he not agree that an early debate on the problems there is required?

Mr. Biffen: I appreciate that there will be much interest in Merseyside over the next two or three weeks, even more than traditionally. The hon. Gentleman will understand that we will be discussing regional policy in the Scottish and Welsh context on Monday, which those concerned would say was a national situation, and I am sure that the House will want to turn to the wider issues. There really is no available Government time before the prorogation.

Sir Gerard Vaughan (Reading, East): Will my right hon. Friend consider providing time for a short debate on the problem of AIDS?

Mr. Biffen: Clearly, my hon. Friend raises a matter of growing concern and I am sure that there will be anxiety that the matter should be debated. There is no possibility of it being debated before prorogation, but perhaps it is something we can come back to in the next Session.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): Will the Leader of the House allow us to have an early debate on the importance of the memorandum of understanding governing the transfer of the results of industrial research from Britain to the United States under the strategic defence initiative? Is he aware that I have in my possession a letter signed by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to a leading British company which, if it is true —I hope that the Leader of the House will say today whether it is true—suggests that the Government are soliciting British companies to transfer the results of their secret long-term research to the Americans? That amounts to industrial espionage, industrial sabotage, and, indeed, industrial treachery.

Mr. Biffen: Since this Administration have been accused of industrial sabotage, espionage and treachery, clearly it is a matter that deeply exercises the hon. Gentleman. The best way that I can help, in the first instance, is to have the matter referred to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): My right hon. friend will be aware that the consultation paper on family courts issued earlier this year has provoked debate among a wide variety of organisations and individuals. Before the Government consider their response to the consultation paper, would it not be appropriate for the House to have an opportunity to discuss it?

Mr. Biffen: I take note of the point, and my hon. Friend will recollect that it is not the first time that he has pressed this view on me. I am sympathetic to his argument, but there is no time before prorogation.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will the Leader of the House arrange an early debate on the important question of the involvement of the Government, and their interference, with the broadcasting authorities? Will he ensure that if we have such a debate he will mention the matter to the chairmen of the Tory party, both past and present, so that they can explain their role in the recent events surrounding the BBC in particular, and in other matters, including the "Panorama" case?

Perhaps the Leader of the House could also persuade the hon. Member for Surrey, North-West (Mr. Grylls) to come to the debate and explain what role he played in dealing with Abdul Shamji, when he said that he had not been to a meeting when it was apparent that he had? Perhaps he can explain to the House just how much he, as chairman of the Tory Small Business Bureau, played in providing Shamji with sufficient moneys, in the great fiddle at the expense of Johnson Matthey bank and subsequently the taxpayer. Perhaps the Prime Minister can explain her friendship with Abdul Shamji, and so can all the other Tories who assisted him to fiddle the taxpayer right after the Johnson Matthey bank fiasco. As a result of all that, perhaps the Tory party will pay that money back.

Mr. Biffen: I am so glad that the long recess has done nothing to alter the hon. Gentleman's character.

Mr. Skinner: Answer the question.

Mr. Biffen: It is a serious question and the answer is that there is no time for a debate next week. If there were, these wild allegations would be even less convincing the longer that they proceeded.

Sir Anthony Kershaw (Stroud): Is my right hon. Friend aware that in the Stroud area there has been for a long time the strange and distressing existence of——

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): A Member of Parliament.

Sir Anthony Kershaw: —meningitis. I am going on for a long time longer too. This disease causes a great deal of distress and anxiety, especially to mothers of small children, and we do not know much about it. Will my right hon. Friend ask my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services whether anything more than is being done can be done to counteract this great anxiety?

Mr. Biffen: I am aware of the points that have been raised by my hon. Friend; they have been given considerable national publicity. I can well understand the deep concern in his constituency about this matter. I shall take up the matter with my right hon. Friend, as has been requested.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): Will it be possible, on Monday 3 November, in the debate on the Lords amendments to the Housing and Planning Bill, to debate the Government's slow but consistent erosion of positive planning? Will we be able to debate the Government's use of special development orders, for instance, to enable a scrap shredder to be sited in my constituency next to residential properties, thereby causing nuisance, dust and noise, without the consent of the local authority because planning approval was not needed? Will we be able to debate the Government's use of special development orders to enable sites to be investigated for the disposal of nuclear waste by the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive, without the local authority or residents being consulted? Will we be able to debate why the Government, using special development orders, have picked four sites in safe Tory areas where Tory middle-class protesters are now campaigning, and why the Government have not sent in the riot squad as they would have done if these people had been printers or striking miners on a picket line?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman will be the first to appreciate that what we debate on the Housing and Planning Bill is entirely within the judgment of the Chair, but I am sure that he will display a great ingenuity in the face of that challenge.

Dr. Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): In view of the importance of disarmament and defence, will my right hon. Friend consider having a debate on the subject so that all parties can state their views in this House before we rise?

Mr. Biffen: Much as I underline the importance of the topic which my hon. Friend mentions, I must say that we have a full legislative programme before prorogation and there is little time left for anything else.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): Does the Leader of the House accept that the proposal which has been made by a number of hon. Members that the House should be advised by an office of technology assessment is primarily a question for the House? It would be most unfortunate if the Prime Minister were to try to kill this proposal before the House had reached a view on the matter.

Mr. Biffen: I will certainly bear the hon. Gentleman's points in mind.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): As my right hon. Friend will know that it is the practice for the Leader of the Opposition to say which of the prayers in his name he wishes the Government to find time for among the available days for that purpose, can he tell us whether the Leader of the Opposition has asked for either of the prayers in his name referring to the cereals levy to be debated before they run out of praying time, the deadline for which is Tuesday next week? If the Leader of the Opposition has not done that, will my right hon. Friend give time for praying against the order on the rates of levy and the parent order before time runs out next Tuesday? If not, will my right hon. Friend allow a debate to annul outside the praying time later in the coming week?

Mr. Biffen: As a fellow agricultural Member, I take note of the important point which my hon. Friend has raised. However, I think that the answer is no but I will have to check that. I will be in touch with my hon. Friend.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Can the Leader of the House confirm that the debate on visas on Monday will take place between 7 pm and 11.30 pm? Can he confirm that a Foreign Office Minister will participate in that debate? Finally, can he tell us the nature of the motion upon which the debate will take place?

Mr. Biffen: The motion will appear and the hon. Gentleman will have the opportunity of seeing it in good time. It is my understanding that the debate will run from 7 pm to 11.30 pm

Mr. Madden: Will there be a Foreign Office Minister?

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Several weeks ago Mr. Roy Gibson, the director of the newly created National Space Centre, presented the Government with the centre's view on a space plan for the United Kingdom. Will my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House ensure that his hon. Friend the Minister for Information Technology comes to the House with a statement about the Government's decision? Even better, will my right hon. Friend allow a debate on such crucial issues as the future of the horizontal take-off and landing system, the future of a European manned space programme and European participation in the American space station programme?

Mr. Biffen: I take account of my hon. Friend's point and I will communicate his views about the desirability of a statement to my hon. Friend the Minister for Information Technology.

Mr. Thomas Torney (Bradford, South): On the points raised earlier about the prayer against the co-responsibility levy for cereals, is the Leader of the House aware that that matter seriously affects the poultry industry and can cause considerable unemployment? From the Opposition Benches, I appeal to the Leader of the House to find time to debate the issue before prorogation.

Mr. Biffen: I believe that there is more chicken in north Shropshire than in Bradford, so I immediately accept the seriousness with which the point is addressed. I have said that I will look into the matter, but I am not able to go beyond that.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): Will my right hon. Friend be able to find time before the Session ends for a debate on Select Committees whose claims have increased, are increasing and, in my view, ought to be diminished?

Mr. Biffen: I note what my hon. Friend says. He will appreciate that if he is successful in catching your eye, Mr. Speaker, he will be able to make many of his points on Wednesday.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): Has the Leader of the House noticed early-day motion No. 1174?

[That this House congratulates England's hockey team for their excellent performances in the World Cup and also Australia, who won it and regrets that in the otherwise excellent television coverage at no time was the fact mentioned that the revenue and other services were provided by the London Borough of Brent which deserves more credit for the good things it achieves.]

Early-day motion No. 1174 covers a narrow point and I obviously cannot ask the Leader of the House for time to debate the matter because of prorogation. However, may I seek the right hon. Gentleman's advice?

I am trying to give credit to the London borough of Brent for the good things that it does because I have to sit on the Opposition Benches—as the Leader of the House knows — and listen to the right hon. Gentleman's colleagues attacking my borough over many issues time and time again. There is never any question of my being able to bring to the House's attention the good things which Brent does—for example, the world hockey cup final, which, thanks to the London borough of Brent, was very successful. Can the Leader of the House advise me how I can redress the uneven balance of Back-Bench questioning about important matters which affect my borough if I cannot have a debate before prorogation?

Mr. Biffen: There is something rather touching about the hon. Gentleman, with all his years of experience in the House, asking me for advice. I must be modest in respect of that invitation. He represents the virtues of the Labour Brent past. We are now seeing the horrors of the Labour Brent future.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): Will my right hon. Friend find time for an early debate on the nuclear industry? Is he aware of the grave concern in Cumbria that 50,000 jobs could be lost because the main Opposition parties are pledged to destroy our nuclear industry in Sellafield and Barrow in Furness?

Mr. Biffen: I think that there would be much advantage in the House having an early opportunity to debate these matters and for the anti-nuclear policies of the Liberal and Social Democratic parties and of the Labour party to be fully assessed. However, that cannot happen this side of prorogation.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): In view of the inadequate and misleading answer given by the Prime Minister to my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) on the question of the British merchant fleet, will the Leader of the House arrange a debate as soon as possible based upon the report of the European Economic Community which takes account of the great dangers which face the British maritime industry on such questions as flags of convenience?

Mr. Biffen: I totally reject the strictures of the hon. Gentleman upon my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. However, I agree that the British merchant fleet is a very important topic. There is no prospect of a debate on that topic this side of prorogation, but I am certain that it will feature in our discussions in the new Session.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. As some hon. Members are now rising who have not previously risen, I shall try to call them. However, I ask for brief questions, as we have a very heavy day before us.

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Berkshire, East): Is my right hon. Friend aware that during the recess there have been two serious squats in my constituency, one on a school playing field and the other on land in a residential area? The squats have caused grave nuisance, inconvenience and harm to my innocent constituents who have been unable to find easy and quick legal redress. In the circumstances, can my right hon. Friend give us any hope that the Home Secretary will come to the House and make a statement about further legislation in this area to protect my innocent constituents?

Mr. Biffen: I will certainly pass the point raised by my hon. Friend to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. I realise that it is of considerable moment to my hon. Friend's constituency.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): The Leader of the House referred to the fact that there is more chicken in Shropshire than in Bradford. I must tell him that there is more duck in Shropshire and I hope that he will not duck this question. If it can be shown to the Leader of the House that senior members of the Government have attempted to influence witnesses in any court case, would he consider that that was a most serious matter demanding the resignation of those hon. Members and an early statement from the Attorney-General?

Mr. Biffen: I would regard that as a most serious matter. I think that the integrity of the charge would be enhanced if it were repeated outside the Chamber.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): I am sure that my right hon. Friend will agree that one of the nation's greatest assets is our inventiveness and innovation. He will thus understand the considerable dismay in certain sections of British industry and commerce at the suggestion in yesterday's Daily Telegraph that the Government might be considering dropping the Copyright Bill from the Queen's Speech. Would my right hon. Friend impress upon others that the Copyright Bill is an essential and much-needed piece of legislation which should certainly be included in the Queen's Speech and that time should be found for it in next Session's business?

Mr. Biffen: I am aware of what my hon. Friend says, but I am sure he will realise—particularly at this time—that convention requires a delicacy on my part in respect of these matters and that therefore I can say nothing.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Is the Leader of the House aware of the enormous amount of administrative confusion and inefficiency in London local government that has arisen since the abolition of the GLC? Is he also aware that it is almost impossible for hon. Members to get any information from the London Residuary Body which is charged with many of the previous functions of the GLC? When can the House expect to receive the annual report of the London Residuary Body, and can the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance that we will be able to debate that report on the Floor of the House?

Mr. Biffen: I shall look into the points that the hon. Gentleman has raised about the report and I shall be in touch with him.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Department of Transport's proposal to complete the Winchester section of the M3 will cause a massive environmental blight to that listed city by entering an area of outstanding natural beauty, severing sites of special scientific interest and destroying two scheduled ancient monuments? Is he also aware that the two national custodians of the sites — the Countryside Commission and the Inspectorate of Scheduled Ancient Monuments —did not even participate in the recent public inquiry? Does he agree that of course there is a need for an urgent completion of the M3 motorway but not at any cost, particularly to the very special environment of the ancient and listed city of Winchester? This has reached almost scandalous proportions. Can we have a full debate rather than just an Adjournment debate on this subject?

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Very good. Very good.

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend has obviously attracted support.

Mr. Faulds: I am glad some of you care.

Mr. Biffen: I understand the point that my hon. Friend argues, which must be of the greatest importance in his constituency. Clearly, there is no prospect of it featuring in a debate between now and prorogation, but I very much hope that he will have his opportunities in the new Session of Parliament.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Does my right hon. Friend anticipate an early opportunity next week to discuss the unwelcome presence in this country of 10 Sinn Fein councillors, two of whom have been to Leicester? Does he accept that this has caused great concern to many people? As we are debating visas next week, does not he agree that Sinn Fein councillors should never be allowed into this country, that they are advocating violence against this country and that the Labour party through its Labour Committee on Ireland and its "Troops Out of Ireland" campaign is doing nothing to give confidence to the Chief Constable and all those in Northern Ireland who care about the security and future of this country?

Mr. Biffen: I am sad that Leicester should be a magnet of all these difficulties, but my hon. Friend raises something that gives rise to real public concern. That is the relationship that exists between some of our conventional politicians and Sinn Fein whose operation in the Republic, Northern Ireland and mainland Britain gives rise to deep concern. I do not believe that there are any explicit circumstances under which my hon. Friend can raise this matter next week, but none the less I have great faith that he will find a way of making sure that it receives public attention.

Viscount Cranborne (Dorset, South): I am sure that my right hon. Friend will have noted with distress the ignorant way in which the management of Sealink Ltd sacked several hundred of my constituents at 24 hours notice in spite of consistent assurances over the preceeding months and years that it would do nothing of the kind. As the Government actually sold Sealink to someone who is clearly not qualified to operate a venture of this kind, will my right hon. Friend try to provide some Government time so that we may have a debate on the matter?

Mr. Biffen: I much regret that there is simply no Government time available before prorogation. I suggest that my hon. Friend might like to try his own initiative to obtain an Adjournment debate.

BBC (Court Case)

4.14 pm

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter which should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the need for an inquiry into evidence of interference with witnesses in the case of Hamilton and Howarth v. the BBC."

You will, Mr. Speaker, recall that in reply to my point of order on Tuesday you said that allegations of interference with witnesses were "pure speculation". I must draw your attention to a letter addressed to "Mr. Selwyn Gummer", the then chairman of the Conservative party, dated 24 November 1984, from the National Young Conservatives. The writer states:

"Loyalty to both the party and to you has prevented me from making public comment on your objections to the Panorama programme . . . However if the activities of certain individuals in Conservative Central Office interfere with legal proceedings against the National Young Conservatives, I cannot remain silent."

He also says:

"On the 22 February the Central Office Legal Officer"—

I have now discovered that it is a man called Mr. David Mitchell—

"contacted a member of the Conservative delegation which had visited Berlin and suggested to him that the account he had given was incorrect and conflicted with the evidence given by other delegation members with whom he had spoken. He claimed to have arranged for these other individuals to put their adjusted version"— adjusted version—

"of events to you in writing. When the delegation member in question refused to change his version it was suggested he speak to no one about the incident and that he lie low . . . The second instance relates to the leaking of information to a certain Sunday newspaper by an individual in Conservative Central Office Press Department. I would have been oblivious to this had not the reporter contacted me for confirmation."

He added:

"In conclusion may I say I find these activities deplorable and would ask you to instigate an investigation immediately."

I have been given this letter by a person who is close to the internal workings of Conservative Central Office. I am informed that a tape recording between Mr. David Mitchell and a witness might be available to me. This is an important matter because the activities of Mr. David Mitchell, who is head of the legal office at Conservative party headquarters, placed him in contravention of the law. It is a common law misdemeanour to obstruct, prevent, pervert or defeat the course of justice.

In the case of Shaw v. Shaw in 1861 and the cases of Bromilow v. Phillips in 1891, and Regina v. Greenberg in 1919, it was decided that it is a contempt to endeavour improperly to influence a person who is a potential witness in a pending case with the intention of affecting that person's evidence; that the fact that the attempt may be unsuccessful is immaterial, the only question being whether the act complained of is calculated to interfere with the due administration of justice.

There are a number of cases relating to the manufacture of false evidence and the inducing of persons to give false evidence. They include the cases of Vreones, Grimes, Andrews and Panayiotou. In the case of Regina v. Kellett, Lord Justice Stephenson said:

"Once legal proceedings have set the course of justice in motion, it is important that it should be allowed to flow unobstructed and undiverted, and that perjury should be exposed and truth ascertained only by examination and cross-examination of witnesses in open court and justice should be administered in the way which is ordinarily pursued"——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must now bring his remarks to a close. He has had three minutes.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: These matters are important. A debate is needed, with the Attorney-General answering demands for an inquiry. Debate is urgently needed as the BBC, for reasons other than the pursuit of justice, and under pressure from Conservative Members of Parliament and the current chairman of the Conservative party, has chosen to ignore the contravention of the law and settled out of court at considerable cost to the licence fee payer. Had the public been aware of this crude attempt by central office to squeeze witnesses——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the need for an inquiry into evidence of interference with witnesses in the case of Hamilton and Howarth v. the BBC."

I have listened with care to what the hon. Gentleman has said, but I regret that I do not consider the matter he has raised to be appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10 and I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Norman Tebbit): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should say——

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): Tell us about the moral majority.

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Tebbit: I should say, Mr. Speaker, that the allegations made by the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours)—not to the police but under the cloak of privilege—will be answered immediately by me, outside, without the benefit of cover of privilege.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This cannot be a continuation of the application. It must be a point of order that I can answer.

Mr. Skinner rose——

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We cannot have hon. Members scurrying across the Chamber like this, Mr. Skinner.

Mr. Skinner: In view of what the chairman of the Tory party has just had to say, may I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that, with regard to the letter from the Young Conservatives, many of us——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That has absolutely nothing to do with me.

Mr. Skinner: You did not stop the chairman leaving the Chamber.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is seeking to raise an issue which has absolutely nothing to do with me. If he raises a point of order with which I can deal, I will endeavour to answer it.

Mr. Skinner: Yes, I will.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will give the hon. Gentleman one last chance.

Mr. Skinner: In view of what the chairman of the Tory party said, both before the application and since, I believe it would be sensible, Mr. Speaker, if you were to arrange for the responsible persons involved with the arm twisting of the broadcasting authorities to come before the appropriate Committee of the House of Commons so that we can ascertain exactly to what extent the two recent chairmen of the Tory party were involved.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Even that is not a matter for me. It is a matter for the Select Committee concerned.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We are in a position of some ambivalence created by the strange role of the chairman of the Conservative party. Here we have, at the head of the Conservative central office, a Cabinet Minister whose sole responsibility seems to be to administer that office. That Minister has used his position to come to the Dispatch Box, not to rebut what has been said but to state that he intends to rebut it somewhere else. That is of importance to the House.

The second point of importance to the House is based on what my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) says has been a calculated attempt by Conservative central office — led by a Conservative Minister — to pervert the course of justice. On today's Order Paper there is a motion, with several amendments, signed by over 100 Conservative Members, demanding the resignation of individuals at the BBC. It is an important matter when the position of the House is used in this way.

The third element which makes this matter especially relevant to the House is the fact that two of our Members have received substantial sums of money, from public funds, which may be as a result—if my hon. Friend the Member for Workington is correct — of a calculated attempt by central office to pervert the course of justice by suppressing information. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the Conservative chairman in his Cabinet role should come to this House and make a statement.—[AN HON. MEMBER: "He has."] He has not. He has stated his intention to make a statement outside.

In view of the severity of the allegations which have been made by my hon. Friend, I suggest that the Attorney-General should consider referring the whole matter to the Director of Public Prosecutions and report to the House on his action.

Mr. Speaker: None of that is a matter for me. I am not responsible for any appointments that may be made in the Cabinet or to the Conservative party. [HON. MEMBERS: "Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker."] Order. I cannot see any conceivable way of answering points of order on this matter.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This allegation is based on whether hon. Members may use the protection of the House to make statements. I have never sought to use that protection but I have never sought to deny any Member of the House who has sought to use it the protection of privilege accorded by this House. Over the years I have been here, Mr. Speaker, the occupants of the Chair have always condemned the kind of conduct that has been displayed by the chairman of the Tory party.

Mr. Speaker: Any Member who makes a Standing Order No. 10 application raises a matter which, unless it is granted for debate, is not answered. If a Front-Bench Member seeks to speak, I have no knowledge of what he will say and he is within his rights to speak.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Ewing: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The point I was making did not concern what the right hon. Gentleman said but his conduct in stamping out of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is not a matter for me.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is for you to judge, because you have just declined an application under Standing Order No. 10 because you did not consider that the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) contained sufficient evidence for you to grant that application——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let me stop the hon. Gentleman there. It did not meet the criteria of the Standing Order. The hon. Gentleman need only look up the Standing Order to know what they are.

Mr. Banks: I understand that point, Mr. Speaker, but Members have only just received copies of this letter. [HON. MEMBERS: "It is two years old."] It was sent by Philip Pedley to the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), and it makes serious allegations. Points have been raised in the House and surely the place for those points to be answered is in this House and not outside.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Surely one of the criteria which are used by you to determine whether a Standing Order No. 10 application should be accepted is whether the matter is urgent. It is obvious from the date of this letter that it has been in circulation for over two years.

Mr. Speaker: I have not seen the letter.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is a simple matter. Am I right in remembering that, a few months ago, Mr. Speaker, you gave a ruling from the Chair regarding Front-Bench Government spokesmen coming to the Dispatch Box to make a statement under the guise of a bogus point of order which precluded Members of the House from questioning that person on the statement? That is especially relevant now, when the chairman of the Conservative party immediately walked out having made his point of order. This is a genuine point of order, Mr. Speaker, and you ought to deplore a bogus point of order and an exit from this House which was done purely to make sure that Labour Members could not question the chairman of the Tory party on the points that he made.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Whether a Member walks out or not is entirely a matter for him. I think the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) might well recollect that he has made such a decision himself.

New Writ (Knowsley, North)

Proceedings resumed on the Question,

That Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the county constituency of Knowsley, North, in the room of Robert Kilroy-Silk Esquire, who since his election for the said county constituency hath accepted the office of steward or bailiff of Her Majesty's Manor of Northstead in the county of York. —[Mr. Foster.]

4.29 pm

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale) rose——

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is within your recollection that when the Labour Chief Whip moved the writ immediately after prayers the leader of the Liberal party was not in his place. The objection was raised by the so-called Chief Whip—which, Mr. Speaker, you may think is a contradiction in terms—of the Liberal party. If the Chief Whip was able to pluck up the courage to raise the objection, why has he not the guts to move the motion himself?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a matter for me. Mr. Steel.

Mr. Steel: Let me answer that point at the beginning of my speech. The object of raising an objection, as the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), as a senior Member of the House, should know, is so that a debate may take place now and questions may be asked now about the moving of the writ.

The point that I seek to raise is simply this. The Opposition Chief Whip yesterday gave his usual courteous notice, through the usual channels, that he intended today to move the writ for the by-election. I acquit him of any blame for what has happened since. However, the House should be aware that this morning the Knowsley, North Labour party sought an injunction in the courts to prevent the imposition on the constituency of a candidate from outside.

In the House, we must take account of the views of the electors in that constituency, starting from the point that they did not ask for the by-election. It has been caused by the desire of our former colleague, Mr. Kilroy-Silk, to go to the pastures that you described, Mr. Speaker, in place of his previous occupation. The electors are landed with a by-election that they did not want, and they are now being landed with a candidate whom they say they do not want. I know of no precedent for a by-election writ to be moved in the House before it is known who the candidate will be for the party—[Interruption.]

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman is fortunate enough he may catch my eye, but he will not do it that way.

Mr. Steel: It is a legitimate matter of public interest that the candidate should be known and that the decision of the courts should be made before the writ is moved. Therefore, I ask whether the leader of the Labour party will agree that until the court's decision is made the writ should not be moved.

One other reason is that it is a little unfair to the alliance candidate—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."]—and, indeed, to the Conservative candidate, if there is one, that they should begin their campaign without knowing who they are fighting against.

For all those reasons, I suggest that we should await the decision of the courts on this matter of extreme public interest.

4.32 pm

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): One of the least attractive features of the Liberal party is the sanctimonious self-righteousness with which its leader usually addresses the House. Today, when he did not even have the courtesy to you, Mr. Speaker, to be here when the Opposition Chief Whip moved the writ for the by-election, he dressed up in the guise of public interest the truth that the Liberal party is not ready for the by-election.

One month ago today the Liberal party, meeting in annual assembly in the Congress theatre, Eastbourne, in my constituency, rejected the defence policy advocated by its leader. The right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel), who has just addressed the House, with characteristic courage, failed to address the Liberal party on the key issue of defence. He was then summoned——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is that relevant to the issue of my warrant?

Mr. Gow: With great respect, Mr. Speaker, we must listen to the real reasons why the leader of the Liberal party addressed the House in the way that he did.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker—you follow these matters closely—that the leader of the Liberal party was summoned from Eastbourne to London by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen). At considerable danger and distress to my constituents, disturbing the elderly voters, the very people whom the Liberal party claims to champion, the right hon. Gentleman travelled by helicopter. It arrived in London, and he waited upon the right hon. Member for Devonport. I was not present, and nor were you, Mr. Speaker, when the doctor received the leader of the Liberal party. [HON. MEMBERS: "The patient."] It is a sign of the new-grown courage of the leader of the Liberal party that he has been able to make a speech in this place in the absence of the doctor.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman must not stray—[Interruption.] Order. It may well be that they met, but did they discuss the warrant?

Mr. Gow: You will remember, Mr. Speaker, the date upon which the Liberal party debated defence. It was Tuesday 23 September 1986. You remember it well, Mr. Speaker, and you have raised the issue, and I believe that you were right to raise it. Did the doctor and the right hon. Gentleman discuss the Knowsley by-election? The attention of the House was directed to the matter not by me, but by Mr. Speaker himself.

Mr. Speaker: I must not be brought into those matters. I say to the whole House that we are only discussing the motion that I read out at the beginning of the debate. We must stick to it.

Mr. Gow: But, Sir, it was you who raised, and, in my view, wisely, the issue about the right hon. Gentleman from the borders and the right hon. Gentleman who represents, for the time being, the Devonport constituency, who is not in his place: what did they discuss at that meeting? It was, of course, in part the shambles of the defence policy of the Liberal party. Of course, the leader of the Liberal party was rebuked by the doctor. That goes without saying. But they also discussed — and you rightly hinted at this, Mr. Speaker—the Knowsley by-election. It was agreed that until there was a suitable defence policy, which you may think is one of the supreme issues of our time, Mr. Speaker, until a policy was patched up, cobbled together, dressed up, fashioned between the right hon. Gentleman and the doctor, it would be unwise to give any encouragement to have the Knowsley by-election. The Liberal party, not for the first time, dressed up its words and deeds as if Liberals were the purest people in the land. That is why we have to expose today the sheer humbug of the Liberal party.

The leader of the Liberal party does not care about the well-being of the people of Knowsley. He cares about one thing only, and that is the presumed electoral advantage of the Liberals. When a Member of the House, particularly a right hon. Member, dresses up as truth that which is manifestly untrue it is right that the House of Commons should have an opportunity of debating the matter.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): In the hon. Gentleman's peroration, are we likely to expect any detail about the 50 per cent. and higher unemployment in parts of Knowsley? Are we likely to expect any details from the hon. Gentleman of the housing conditions, the poverty and low wages in that area, or are we to be subjected, in the next 10 minutes, as for the past five minutes, to the worst form of public school stupidity that epitomises this place?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not be tempted to raise any of those issues. The issue before the House is whether or not this warrant should be issued.

Mr. Gow: That is indeed the issue before the House, Mr. Speaker, and I say to the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist), who shares a visual similarity with Mr. Leslie Huckfield, that he need have no fear. In the opening few moments of my speech, I referred to the Liberal party. Mr. Speaker, have no fear. I turn now to the views of the Labour party and to the reasons why the Opposition Chief Whip, in the absence of the leader of the Liberal party, moved the writ immediately after prayers. Even the leader of the Liberal party was quite correct when he said that it is necessary to move the writ for this by-election because there is no longer a Member of Parliament for Knowsley, North. But there was a Member of Parliament for Knowsley, North and, by one of those accidents of events, I happen to have with me extracts from the excellent book that he has just written. You, Mr. Speaker, have, I am sure, read the book.

Mr. Speaker: No, I have not.

Mr. Gow: In that case, there are one or two extracts that I should like to read from it. The reasons for the by-election are set out with commendable clarity by our former colleague, Mr. Kilroy-Silk. He has some observations to make about his colleagues. One of the extraordinary features of the Opposition is that they preach the universal brotherhood of man but that they hate and abuse one another even more than they hate and abuse us. If any right hon. or hon. Member believes that I overstate the case, here is an example which I wish to read to the House.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): What has this got to do with the issue of the writ?

Hon. Members: A great deal!

Mr. Gow: I am trying to explain why there is to be a by-election.

Mr. Speaker: We know that there is to be a by-election. The hon. Gentleman must concentrate upon whether I should issue my warrant in respect of it.

Mr. Gow: In that case, Mr. Speaker, I shall shorten my speech to this extent. I intend to give only one illustration of the brotherly love that permeates not only the Opposition but the Labour party throughout the country:

"The conference floor erupted. And that bastard Eric Heffer, the prima donna to outdo all prima donnas, got up and lumbered off the platform and out of the hall."

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is an old parliamentary hand and knows that he must not use language of that kind. That is an unparliamentary word, even by attribution, and I ask him to withdraw it in respect of the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer).

Mr. Gow: I think it is in order, is it not, Mr. Speaker, to point——

Mr. Speaker: No. It is clearly set out in "Erskine May" that unparliamentary words may not be used about another hon. Member, even by attribution.

Hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Gow: Of course I withdraw, and of course I make it clear that that is not how I should describe the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer). I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman if he wishes to disagree with me, but I say to my right hon. and hon. Friends that if the hon. Member for Walton were sitting on this side of the House, I should describe him as my hon. Friend.

It has to be conceded that the Opposition Chief Whip moved the writ for the by-election. We on this side of the House well understand the reluctance of the Opposition Front Bench to see the return to this place of Mr. Leslie Huckfield. Although I have been in this place for only a very short time, I think it would be true to say that Mr. Huckfield was not the most popular Member of this place. I find myself, therefore, in respectful agreement with the decision yesterday of the National Executive Committee, although it was not, I believe, secured in a spirit of the greatest fraternity. I well understand the view of the National Executive Committee. However, the grounds on which the NEC is trying to prevent Mr. Leslie Huckfield from becoming the candidate for Knowsley, North are breathtaking. The disqualification——

Mr. Nellist: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: What is it?

Mr. Nellist: I distinctly remember that during the miners' strike when court cases were being heard outside this building you, Mr. Speaker, made rulings as to what matters could or could not be raised. Today there is an action in the High Court concerning the remarks about which the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) is speaking. You ought to be aware of that fact when the hon. Gentleman makes those remarks.

Mr. Speaker: I am aware of the fact that an action is pending, but in respect of this matter I think that I should exercise my discretion and allow the debate to go forward.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It relates to the timetable, upon which the Chief Whip of the Labour party might be able to assist us. People are at the High Court in the Strand at the moment; according to the tapes, they are seeking to appear before the Lord Chief Justice. I wonder, therefore, whether the Opposition Chief Whip would accept that the motion should be withdrawn for today until the outcome of this highly relevant court case is made clear.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The debate is already proceeding, but since the matter has been raised I think that I should give this ruling on it. The motion that is before the House is an important matter of privilege affecting the composition of this House, and in my view the House should not be prevented, by proceedings elsewhere, from debating or deciding it. Accordingly, I propose to exercise my discretion and to allow the motion to proceed.

Mr. Gow: I was reminding the House about the decision of the National Executive Committee of the Labour party, of which the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is a distinguished member. [HON. MEMBERS: "He is not here. Where is he?"] The reason that was given as to why Mr. Leslie Huckfield was unsuitable as a candidate for the Labour party was that he had broken an undertaking. Since when has it been an obstacle to being a candidate for the parliamentary Labour party that one has broken an undertaking? That is a completely novel proposition for the Opposition.

Mr. Steve Norris (Oxford, East): It is a basic requirement.

Mr. Gow: Indeed; my hon. Friend says that it is almost a precondition.

Mr. Leslie Huckfield, whom I would not describe as my hon. Friend, even if he were sitting on this side of the House, apparently has been deprived by the comrades in Knowsley of the right to be chosen because he broke an undertaking. To whom did he give the undertaking? It was not given to you, Mr. Speaker. As far as I know, it was not given to the right hon. Gentleman who leads the Opposition. It was certainly not given to the doctor who is not present. I did not like the way in which the Labour party, which sometimes claims to be the champion of a certain amount of modest dishonesty within its ranks, sought to impose its wishes and to inhibit the free choice of the comrades who control the party in Knowsley. I would have given the comrades in Knowsley their head.

If I had been a member of the National Executive Committee of the Labour party, which I readily concede that I might, I would have voted with the hon. Member for Bolsover. The reason that I would have done so is this. It is not that I like Mr. Huckfield; I have made it clear that I do not. However, it is wrong that the central part of a democratic party should seek to dictate to a local part of that party. Provided, as is mercifully the case in every one of the Government's constituencies, that our associations are properly constituted, it is up to our local association to choose the candidate. It is a procedure which my right hon. and hon. Friends do not fear. We do not fear it because we have not had massive infiltration of the kind that the Labour party has suffered.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): My hon. Friend may be aware that Mr. Leslie Huckfield is also a member of the European Parliament. Does he consider it possible that one of the motives for the events that he has described is that the Labour party fears that, if Mr. Huckfield were selected as a candidate in Knowsley, North, and if by some misadventure he were elected to this House, either he would be carrying a double mandate or he would be forced to resign from the European Parliament, thus giving rise to another unwanted by-election for the European Parliament?

Mr. Gow: My hon. Friend must not lead me astray. I remind him that I was one of a small band on this side of the House and of a much larger band on the other side of the House that was and remains opposed to direct elections to the European Assembly.

It may have occurred to you, Mr. Speaker, that the drama facing the Labour party, and now apparently facing the electorate of Knowsley, North, is that if we had not had direct elections the issue of the so-called undertaking would never have arisen. It was an undertaking, so we are told, that so long as Mr. Huckfield was a Member of the European Assembly he would not seek election to this place.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether it is possible for you to reconsider your decision under Standing Order No. 10? Would it not be better for us to discuss the serious issue of the Tory party interfering with witnesses than to listen to this rubbish?

Mr. Speaker: That is a completely different issue. I remind the hon. Member, who has been speaking for about 20 minutes, that we have a heavy day in front of us and that other hon. Members wish to take part in the debate.

Mr. Gow: I defer to your wishes, Mr. Speaker. The anticipation with which I shall listen to the remainder of the debate will be matched only by the eagerness with which I await the return of a Conservative Member for Knowsley, North.

4.54 pm

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): I am intrigued by what the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) said about me. I must tell him that if he sat on this side of the House I would call him an honourable Friend. Whether I would actually believe that is a different matter altogether. I understand that, in the House of Commons, it is usually the case that people on one's own side of the House are one's enemies — whatever party one is in — and that people on the other side of the House are usually one's personal friends, if not one's political friends. That is how it goes. I do not intend to say anything about the book to which the hon. Gentleman referred. I should, however, point out that there are other books available which hon. Members might like to read. I would hope that there are more serious books on politics than the one referred to.

The debate is about the moving of a writ. Whenever a writ is moved, whenever a writ is accepted and whenever a by-election takes place, the House and the country should bear in mind the terrible problems of the people in the area concerned. The constituency of Knowsley, North is next to my constituency. The area has one of the highest levels of unemployment in this country. Over 50 per cent. of the people on some housing estates are unemployed. As in many other parts of Merseyside, there is a growing drugs problem. Young people are out of work. Many of them came down here some time ago to meet the Prime Minister to urge the creation of employment. They are still out of work.

Those are the problems that must be faced when an election takes place. The only party that has any idea of how to deal with the problems is the Labour party. We are not afraid of an election, because I am convinced that the people of Knowsley, North will vote for the Labour party on the next occasion, as they have consistently voted for it over the years.

If I disagree with certain aspects of what has happened, it is with the rights of the constituency Labour party. That is the only issue with which I disagree. I cannot remember, over a long time, any candidate in my party being appointed over the head of the constituency Labour party. I have a feeling that if I were a delegate on that general management committee Mr. Huckfield might not have received my vote, but that is not the issue. There may well be some argument about whether the national executive has a right to say who should or should not be a candidate because he is a Member of the European Parliament, but there cannot be an argument about the right of any constituency Labour party to decide who the candidate should be. That is the only point that I make about that.

I cannot understand why the Liberal party has raised this matter, because yesterday the Liverpool Daily Post stated:

"Steel tells Labour: Hurry up or else."

It went on to say:

"David Steel is to present an ultimatum to Neil Kinnock: move the writ in the Knowsley, North by-election or the Liberals will do it for you."

Our Front Bench, for good or ill, has moved the writ and now the Liberals say "Hold it up." That is typical of the Liberal party, and my dad would have had words to say about it, but I will not repeat them in the House. In essence, the Liberal party never quite knows where it is going or what it is involved in. I expected it today to produce all sorts of horrific stories that are supposed to be going on and I have evidence to answer all those horrific stories, but we have not reached that point.

There should be second thoughts about the matter and we should allow the local Labour party, democratically and through the party's constitution, to decide who the candidate should be. But whenever the election takes place, the Labour party will win it, because it is the only party that will deal with the problems of Knowsley, North.

5.1 pm

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): The motion before us relates to the issuing of a writ and it is entirely in that context that I wish to make my remarks. The question is whether Knowsley, North shall elect a Member of Parliament to this House during the next three weeks.

I am not concerned with whether that election will give rise to the possibility of a Labour Member, a Conservative Member or a Liberal Member being elected, although I would like a Conservative Member to be elected. I am concerned in this debate, which is given precedence over the Orders of the Day, only with the serious subject of whether or not the constituency should be represented by a Member of Parliament a certain number of days after moving the writ.

I support the Opposition Chief Whip in moving the writ and I want to detail some of the problems facing Knowsley, North. I cannot hope to match the rhetoric and excellent style of the previous speeches and I shall not attempt to do so. It has been suggested to me that if I cannot match the skill of my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) in making his case, I should not speak, but there are serious points that I wish to make. I always wonder what might happen in any constituency were an hon. Member to vacate his seat and leave his constituents dependent on the House of Commons moving a writ. I contemplate that in regard to my constituency from time to time.

In the post-war years, much of Liverpool's poorer population was resettled in council housing developments on the edge of the Merseyside conurbation. I am sure that the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) will agree that the most notorious is Kirkby. It is not a new town but a series of vast council house estates which were created in the 1950s. In 1951 its population was 3,000 and in 1961 it was 52,000. Kirkby has had a dramatic effect on the politics of north-east Liverpool which is bounded by Knowsley, North. Indeed, Kirkby is now part of the Knowsley, North constituency which once formed part of the Huyton constituency represented by Lord Wilson. Kirkby played a major role in lifting his majority from 854 in 1950 to more than 19,000 in 1964.

In February 1974 Kirkby was moved into the relatively rural area of Ormskirk, which was formerly a safe Tory seat, but which was won by the former Member, Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk. It now forms the basis of the Knowsley, North constituency and, divorced from the Conservative part of west Lancashire, is undoubtedly one of Labour's safest seats.

As the hon. Member for Walton said, Kirkby has many problems and deprivations which breed vandalism and violence. It suffers from appalling unemployment and housing blight. Tower blocks built only a decade ago, such as Tower Hill, have already had to be demolished. Small wonder that "Z Cars", the BBC TV crime series in the 1960s and early 1970s, was set there. It has a great scarcity of leisure services to offer its population.

I understand why Liberal Members are taking such interest in whether or not the writ is moved because until now they have been the only effective opposition to the Labour party there, although that has always been the case with local elections. The rest of Knowsley, North consists of Cantril Farm—a 1960s peripheral development which is just outside the Liverpool city boundary — and of Prescot — an industrial company town which is dominated by the huge British Insulated Callendar Cables plant.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman will tell us the purpose of his speech? Is it so that the Conservative candidate, when selected, can find his way to Kirkby and will know something about the conditions there? All of this is old hat for most of us in the area. We know what Kirkby is and how it has suffered under the Tory Government. I wonder why the Prime Minister is not present to answer the hon. Gentleman's allegations.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) is in order in what he is saying, but I must say to the whole House that it is clear from the Order Paper that we have a busy day ahead of us. The only issue before us is whether or not I issue my warrant in respect of this particular by-election. I hope that we can concentrate on that.

Mr. Brown: I am making a serious speech and my only motive is that I am extremely concerned about a constituency which does not have a Member of Parliament because its Member has resigned. It must rely on a writ being moved in order to be represented. I have some serious points which are pertinent and relate to the precedence that this matter of privilege is given in the order of business.

In reply to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing), there may well be many hon. Members in and around the area that he represents who know the area well, but other hon. Members who do not have the privilege of knowing Liverpool's problems are bing invited either to vote in favour of or against moving the writ. It is precisely because of the problems which the hon. Gentleman criticises me for raising that I feel required to bring them to the attention of the House so that the House may decide by a large majority, if the matter is pressed to a Division, that the writ shall be moved. In that way, the problems of which we may be unaware, but of which the hon. Gentleman is so well aware, can be drawn to the attention of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In this debate the hon. Gentleman cannot deal with the issues that may arise during the course of a by-election. The only issue before us now is the timing of this by-election.

Mr. Brown: By describing the constituency as I have done, one will surely arrive at the conclusion that, after so many years of being absorbed in large constituencies, it is only right that Kirkby should form the core of a seat which is smaller than average. No other town can need effective representation more desperately than Kirkby, which means that the town needs a Member of Parliament to be elected at the earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): The hon. Gentleman is not correct to say that Knowsley, North is unique in being without a Member. Will the hon. Gentleman assist in moving a writ for Welwyn Hatfield?

Mr. Brown: I am not aware that there is a vacancy anywhere apart from Knowsley, North. My only reason for speaking to the House now is to show why I support moving the writ for Knowsley, North. Therefore, I cannot refer to any other parliamentary constituency.

When a constituency has such problems it needs a Member of Parliament in the House. Knowsley, North is denied a Member because of the decision, for understandable reasons, of the previous Member not to remain in the House. Regardless of the party political debates which may be going on elsewhere, in the High Court and within individual political parties relating to the selection of a candidate, the people of Knowsley, North need a Member of Parliament, of some kind, to represent their interests. Until they have a Member to do so, the problems which I have touched upon will have no chance of effective representation in the House.

The moving of this writ has also provided an opportunity to raise a number of important issues. This will be the first by-election since the nation saw, on its television screens during the summer, the problems of nuclear waste. This issue has become part of a national campaign by all parties. Knowsley, North is the first constituency to have a by-election since this issue became of national importance, not just of local importance to constituencies such as my own, and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg). The people of Knowsley have an opportunity to show the House what they think of important national issues, and not just those issues local to Liverpool. They would want to have a Member of Parliament elected at the earliest possible opportunity if they faced issues similar to those faced by my constituents. If the writ were to be passed by the House, that Member would, in response to the issue of nuclear waste being raised during the course of the election campaign, be able to draw it to the attention of the House.

A by-election now is important for the people of Knowsley because the issues which concern them are national as well as local issues. They are concerned about the future of nuclear power, and about what happens to the nuclear waste which is generated by their local hospitals. They are anxious to ensure that the decisions which the Government take will meet with the electorate's approval. They will be the first group of people in the country to be able to express their views on the nuclear industry since the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive was given the authority to test drill for nuclear waste dumps. The decision on whether to have an early by-election is crucial because the nuclear industry will be a major feature, not only of by-election campaigns, but also of the next general election campaign.

The problem of nuclear waste does not just touch those of us who have the misfortune to live in areas selected for nuclear waste disposal testing. It affects other constituencies in the country and it is, therefore, important that the electorate of Knowsley, North should have the opportunity to decide whether they shall have a Member of Parliament who will take a close interest in it. It could be thought that this issue will not concern the people of Knowsley because they are some way from sites for the disposal of nuclear waste. It is a matter of concern to them, however, because if Knowsley, North were selected to have a nuclear waste dump, and if there were no Member of Parliament, as is the case at the moment, the people of Knowsley would feel very hard done by.

There should be a by-election in that constituency because it has many problems which are unrepresented in the House at present. If we were to disapprove the motion to move the writ, as the Liberals invite us to do, those problems would remain unrepresented for even longer, and the constituency has been unrepresented for long enough already. It is time that the constituency had a Member of Parliament to take an interest, not only in the problems that affect it directly, but also in problems relating to the rest of the country. This applies especially to nuclear waste. I hope that the people of Knowsley, North will elect a Member on such grounds.

5.17 pm

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): I promise not to detain the House for long. This afternoon's debate touches the important question of constitutional propriety. Given the events of the last 24 hours and the High Court action, the timing of this by-election should be considered. The former Member for Knowsley, North

Mr. Kilroy-Silk announced his intention to resign his seat in August. He sat on his resignation for two months and did not resign until October.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) has argued that we should proceed with this by-election as quickly as possible. It should not have been necessary at all. The Liberal party did not call it. It was not forced by the resignation of a Liberal Member. The by-election has been caused because, by his own admission, a Member of this House was hounded out of his position in his constituency. Before calling the by-election, we should reflect for 24 hours, as my right hon. Friend suggested, on the decision of the High Court. We should reflect because the same thing will happen to another Labour Member as happened to the previous one who had the endorsement of the leadership of the Labour party and the national executive.

It cannot be fair to the ordinary people who live in the Knowsley constituency that they should be subjected to such internecine warfare that a Member of the House cannot concentrate on the issues that he should but rather ends up having to fight a rearguard action against his own members. If Knowsley Labour party does not believe that the candidate put forward by the national executive should be chosen, why should the electors of the borough of Knowsley?

Mr. Peter Lilley (St. Albans): Has the change of heart over the past 24 hours by the Leader of the Liberal party about the timing of the election anything to do with the publication of an opinion poll showing a slump in the Liberal's fortunes?

Mr. Alton: If the hon. Gentleman looks more closely at that opinion poll he will see that my right hon. Friend the leader of the Liberal party remains the most popular of the political leaders. But opinion polls are sometimes misleading. More important are the votes which are put in the box. There was a by-election in Knowsley, North, in Prescot, seven or eight weeks ago in the summer. The alliance polled 64 per cent. of the vote and the Conservative party polled 5 per cent.

We have no fears of fighting this by-election. Our fear is that great constitutional questions of propriety and the rights of Members are at stake. We are concerned about the poor pickets outside the Labour party headquarters in Knowsley, North whose views have been ignored in the past 24 hours and those women who chained themselves as sufragettes in Walworth road. Like the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), who is not in his seat but who was one of those who voted last night that the constituency Labour party in Knowsley should have had the right to decide who the candidate would be, we are concerned about the rights of Members.

For those reasons, we should have liked the Labour Chief Whip to rise to the occasion and agree to reflect and ponder on this important question for 24 hours. We are sad that he did not do so and we shall have to bear that in mind when we decide whether to vote. In the absence of any rational thought on the part of the Labour party's Front Bench, we shall have no choice but to go along with other hon. Members and ensure that the vote takes place in Knowsley, North and that an alliance candidate is elected.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): As the Member of Parliament representing the constituency adjacent to Knowsley, North and the cessor of two-thirds of my constituency to the former Member of Parliament, Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk, I know something about the situation.

I respectfully agree with the comments of the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer), but for entirely different reasons. A constituency party's decision on its candidate is being overruled by the national executive despite the democratic choice of the members of that constituency party and that is a matter of great importance to the House.

We must also look at the shady motivations of the Labour party's Chief Whip in moving the writ at this stage. It is not to advance the election of a Member of Parliament to Knowsley, North; it is to cover up the true nature of the Labour party in Liverpool and in Knowsley and the north-west, not in any interest of democracy that we in the House would look to.

The position is simple. The true Knowsley, North Labour party is down the road in the Strand trying to obtain a writ from a High Court judge to prevent Mr. Huckfield from being disqualified as the candidate for Knowsley, North.

The House should bear in mind one of the comments of Mr. Kilroy-Silk in his book which relates to my seat in west Lancashire. You may be aware, Mr. Speaker, of one reason why the Labour party's Chief Whip is moving the writ. Mr. Kilroy-Silk was approached, as he said in his book, by the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry), who I do not think is in his place.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside) rose——

Mr. Hind: He approached him as the chairman of the Merseyside group of Members of Parliament and he told Mr. Kilroy-Silk that they would offer him a deal. The deal was that if he would stand down in Knowsley, North they would offer him the Labour nomination for Parliament for west Lancashire to fight against me.

Mr. Parry rose——

Mr. Hind: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman when I have finished. It is notable that no writs have been flying about from the hon. Member for Riverside.

That offer was made following a meeting of what was called the broad Left in Liverpool. We all know what the broad Left in Liverpool means. It means Militant as much as anything. They had decided that Mr. Tony Mulhearn was to be the candidate. We all know that he is one of the eight that the Labour party has recently expelled because he was a member of Militant — only eight, not the thousands that we know are members of the Labour party in the north-west.

The importance of that for my part of the world is that that meeting in Lancashire must have contained representatives of the Labour party in west Lancashire to be able to sew up such a deal. That means that a lot of those members who have now elected, believe it or not, the chairman of the west Lancashire Labour party as their candidate in the next election—he was chairman at the time that that meeting took place — must have known something about it as well.

Mr. Gow: As the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) is in his place, and since, mercifully, my hon.

[Mr. Gow]

Friend has the relevant extract from this excellent book, will he remind the House of what happened in the alcove between the hon. Member for Riverside and our former friend?

Mr. Hind: It will be my pleasure. The hon. Member for Riverside is alleged to have said:

"'I've been asked to have a word with you as chairman of the group.' He coughed. He meant the Merseyside Group of Labour MPs — which did not meet very often and the identity of whose chairman was unknown even to some members of the Group. He seemed hesitant. I was impatient to vote and leave for home."

"'I've a . . . ' He looked round again. 'I've been asked to offer you a deal.' I listened, first with incredulity, then amazement, and finally with a mixture of anxiety and anger.

What the 'deal' amounted to was that I should reconcile myself to the 'fact' that I would not be reselected for my Knowsley North seat but be replaced by the Militant supporter and president of Liverpool Labour Party, Tony Mulhearn. That, he said, had already been 'decided'."

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. Gentleman proceeds with these interesting extracts, I should remind him that all that took place in the past and we are talking about what happens next.

Mr. Hind: I only raise these matters because they are relevant for you to consider, Mr. Speaker, in relation to this by-election and the interests of the voters of Knowsley, North.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk goes on:

"I could have the candidature for the neighbouring, but Tory-held, West Lancashire constituency."

That is my seat.

"If however, I refused to accept 'reality' and caused a public row, I would find myself blacklisted in West Lancashire and elsewhere, as well as Knowsley, North."

That is very relevant. The true Labour party is not being represented by the decision of the Labour party executive.

Mr. Parry: The Gentleman has quoted extensively from the so-called book of Mr. Kilroy-Silk. But the statements in that book are a complete distortion of what happened. At the request of many trade unionists, including my own union, the Transport and General Workers Union, and members of the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers who had been sacked and who had lost their jobs in Kirkby, I spoke to Mr. Kilroy-Silk. He had not raised one finger to save the jobs of those thousands of workers. I asked Mr. Kilroy-Silk, if he was democratically deselected—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is an intervention. The hon. Gentleman must be brief.

Mr. Parry: It is common knowledge in the Labour party that if the 1983 general election had not occurred when it did Mr. Kilroy-Silk would not have been selected because of his lack of effort on behalf of the people of Kirkby. There had been speculation that he was going to resign or stand as an independent Labour candidate against a selected member, so I put it to him that he should not split the Labour vote and should not resign or stand as an independent member. There was no mention of west Lancashire, of Mr. Tony Mulhearn or of anyone else.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk has been one of the most disgraceful Members of Parliament for Merseyside for many years —[Interruption.] In 10 years, he did not attend one meeting of the Merseyside group, and often flatly refused to meet official delegations from Merseyside, from his own constituency, from the unemployed——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman seems to be making more of a speech than an intervention.

Mr. Parry rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order The hon. Gentleman has had long enough.

Mr. Parry rose——

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman may make one last point.

Mr. Parry: Mr. Kilroy-Silk refused to meet pensioners and handicapped people from his own constituency, including blind people. That is why he is attacked by people in the Labour party. He has done nothing for more than 10 years. He has put it in his book——

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I say to the hon. Gentleman that we have dealt in considerable detail with what is alleged to have happened in the past? The only issue before us is whether this warrant be issued. We must not concentrate on what is to happen in the next few weeks.

Mr. Hind: I wish to reinforce what I said. These matters need to be seriously considered. We have heard the hon. Member for Riverside. I declare an interest as a member of the legal profession. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to meet me in the Lobby afterwards, I can start to prepare his libel case against Mr. Kilroy-Silk.

If Mr. Kilroy-Silk is correct, he was not good enough for Knowsley, North but he was good enough for west Lancashire. He obviously decided that discretion was the better part of valour and decided to stick with Knowsley, North because he thought that the Tories of west Lancashire were made of sterner stuff.

5.34 pm

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): Perhaps I should remind the House that the Labour Chief Whip has moved the writ in the normal way. It is very unusual for the moving of a writ to be the subject of debate in the House. When the motion has been debated, it has normally been because Back Benchers on both sides of the House have considered that the party claiming the seat or previously representing it has been too dilatory. In other words, in the few debates that we have had, the complaint has been that the motion should have been moved more swiftly and that the electors of the constituency concerned are being denied the services of their Member of Parliament.

The purpose of the House in debating such matters has always been to ensure that the constituents' interests are paramount and that they should have the first opportunity of putting to the test the rival claims of the different political parties that they will provide the best Member of Parliament for that constituency.

I thought that the leader of the Liberal party made a thin, threadbare and wholly unconvincing case that was not related in any way to the action that has been taken in the courts or to the issuing of the writ. Candidates are often subject to procedures in the courts, but we must decide whether we should move the writ and whether, therefore, we should give the people of Knowsley, North the opportunity of voting for their new Member of Parliament at the earliest moment.

Mr. Steel: What precedent is there for doubt about the nomination of the candidate to be hanging over the period of the issue of a writ? I know of none.

Mr. Shore: I can think of no precedent, but it is not relevant to the issue of the writ, which is entirely a matter for the House. It would be an invasion of the privileges of the House, as we have heard, if the court were to make such a judgment. Indeed, to the best of my knowledge there is a named, nominated candidate for that constituency. Each party operates under different rules and procedures, and until and unless our rules and procedures are shown to be false in a court of law, that nomination stands.

The only positive feature of the leader of the Liberal party's unfortunate introduction of this debate was to expose the motives of the alliance parties. He confessed at the end of his speech that if we proceeded today it would be unfair to alliance candidates. My hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) has already very properly drawn attention to the heading in the Liverpool Daily Post or the Liverpool Echo—I forget which—in which the leader of the Liberal party apparently threatened, "Hurry up or else". No doubt the Liberals would move the writ themselves. It is an astonishing volte face in a ridiculous period of time.

I now wish only to congratulate some of the hon. Members who took part in this debate on providing us with some entertainment and with even more buffoonery. However, the House should now reach a decision and give the people concerned the opportunity of deciding who is to be the Member of Parliament for Knowsley, North.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the county constituency of Knowsley, North, in the room of Robert Kilroy-Silk, Esquire, who since his election for the said county constituency hath accepted the office of steward or bailiff of Her Majesty's Manor of Northstead in the county of York.

Orders of the Day

Sex Discrimination Bill [Lords]

Order for Third Reading read.

5.39 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. John Lee): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The Bill has two aims: to extend equal opportunities and to remove unnecessary bureaucracy. I know from the reports of the Committee stage and from our debates on Report yesterday that there are still differences of opinion about some of the detail of the Bill. Some Opposition Members seem strangely fond of bureaucracy and reluctant to agree to any proposals aimed at its reduction. But I know that all sides are united in supporting the Bill's primary aim of extending equal opportunities.

Our nation needs the talent of all its people if it is to become more efficient and therefore more competitive and prosperous. Only in that way can we hope to provide more real job opportunities for both men and women. We will not achieve this if either men or women are denied opportunities because of unreasonable, restrictive sex discrimination. The Bill is a further step towards the removal of such discrimination.

Hon. Members will not want me to review the details of the Bill's provisions, but I will touch on its highlights. With the new clauses inserted in Committee it now has three parts. The first, clauses 1 and 6, amends our legislation to conform with the judgment of the European Court of Justice. It said that our legislation was deficient on three counts: the blanket exemptions for small households, firms with five or fewer employees and the way that it dealt with non-legally binding collective agreements. Following a suggestion in another place this part of the Bill also brings partnerships of five or fewer within the scope of the Sex Discrimination Act — a fitting acknowledgement of the increase in the number of women entering business on their own account and of the Government's commitment to self-employment. One in four of those who are self-employed and also one in four of those who are enterprise allowance scheme participants are women.

We have had extensive discussions on the wording of the provision concerning private households. It is a most important provision since it could directly affect the homes of everyone in the country at some point in their lives. I know some hon. Members feel that the wording is still not sufficiently precise, but in my view it nicely balances two principles: the elimination of unreasonable sex discrimination and respect for private life.

The second part of the Bill consists of the new clauses added in Committee, clauses 2 to 5.

Clauses 2 and 3 provide for equal treatment in retirement age, and we introduced them in Committee as a result of the European Court's judgment in February in the case of Miss Marshall v. South-West Hampshire area health authority. Clause 2 makes it unlawful for an employer compulsorily to treat a woman differently from a comparable male employee solely on grounds of age. For example, it makes it unlawful compulsorily to retire her at 60 while allowing a man in a comparable situation to go on working until 65, or to refuse her promotion or training because she is nearing 60 while allowing such rights to a man. Clause 3 gives a woman who is dismissed by her employer the right to claim unfair dismissal up to age 65, unless of course the undertaking where she works has a different normal retirement age which applies to both men and women.

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): Will the Minister take this last opportunity to explain why the Government have not ended some discrimination against women who are still not entitled to redundancy payments if they are between the ages of 60 and 65? Surely that point should have been tackled when we were dealing with pensions and unfair dismissal. However, the Government did not deal with it, so will they tell us why?

Mr. Lee: If I have time, I shall endeavour to answer that point later. However, as the hon. Gentleman knows, we are pressed for time. Clauses 2 and 3 represent a major step along the road to full equality, which has been welcomed on all sides. No longer can it be assumed that a woman has finished her working life before a man, and many employers are having to reconsider their policies which rest on this assumption. Although we have provided for employers to have up to a year to comply with these new provisions, not all will need so long to rearrange their procedures and adjust their manpower planning, and I hope that employers will make these necessary and welcome changes as quickly as they can.

Clause 4 removes the administrative hurdle which previously faced organisations wishing to provide training for people of one sex in occupations where they are seriously under-represented or for people in special need of training because they have been out of the labour market discharging domestic or family responsibilities. Experience has shown that this check is no longer necessary, and I believe that its removal will give further encouragement to the aim of bringing more women into occupations associated with science or new technology in which their numbers are still too few.

Clause 5 closes a small loophole in sex discrimination laws by preventing local authorities from using public entertainment licensing powers in a sex discriminatory way. I know of no authorities which currently discriminate, but the deficiency in our law was brought to our attention by the European Commission and we are now remedying it.

I turn to the third and final objective of the Bill—the repeal of restrictions on hours of work. Clause 7 removes outdated and discriminatory restrictions on the hours women may work in industrial undertakings, and clause 8 repeals the Baking Industry (Hours of Work) Act 1954, which restricts night baking by male bakery workers.

The repeal of restrictions on women's hours are quite simply aimed at removing discriminatory legislation that has outlived its original purpose. The restrictions originated as long ago as the mid-19th century when industrial conditions, the position of women, and society in general were very different from today. It is high time that the 1·5 million women in the manufacturing sector should shed the somewhat second-class status that these restrictions imply. They should be permitted to determine their own hours of work with their employers without the law's intervention. It is illogical that women in this one sector should be held back in this way. The repeals will merely put these women on a par not only with men in manufacturing but with the 8 million women in jobs where there are no legislative restrictions on hours of work.

The repeals will also remove a bureaucratic burden from employers. At present, employers may request the Health and Safety Executive to issue special exemption orders, renewable annually where they argue that it is necessary for increased efficiency. The House has not refused a request in recent years, and during the year 1984-85 more than 4,000 special exemption orders were granted covering more than 200,000 of the 1·5 million women in manufacturing. Almost half of those exemptions allowed some night working by women.

The flexibility provided by this exemption procedure strengthens the case for repeal rather than diminishing it. It implies that the restrictions on hours have little practical relevance in today's world. But I must stress that we would not repeal the restrictions if it involved any risks in our view to health and safety.

In this context, we should not forget the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974. This comprehensive Act takes the modern approach to health, safety and welfare at work, leaving older legislation to play a subsidiary role. It imposes on all employers a general duty to ensure, as far as is reasonably practicable, the health, safety and welfare at work of all employees. Employers must still consider the effects of changes in hours on their employees.

As I have said, the Baking Industry (Hours of Work) Act 1954 regulates the hours which men may work in the baking industry, specifically excluding women from its provisions. The repeal of restrictions on women's hours would produce a ridiculous situation whereby the hours of men working in bakeries would continue to be regulated but women's hours would not. The options are to repeal the Act as we have chosen to do, or to extend it to women as the Opposition would prefer.

I do not want to rehearse previous arguments raised in Committee and on Report. Let me just make two points: first, the Act empowers the Secretary of State to issue exemptions suspending the statutory restrictions on hours if a collective agreement exists. Six such exemptions have been granted over the years, exempting from the Act some two thirds of employees in baking who settle their hours by collective agreement. The weaknesses that existed in the bargaining machinery of the industry are therefore no longer apparent.

Secondly, the Federation of Bakers has assured us that there is no prospect of job losses on the scale that the union fears. Although we understand the very natural anxieties that women may feel about the repeals, these fears must be kept in perspective. Millions of women — the vast majority — work in jobs where hours are not regulated by law and they organise their lives without apparent difficulty. Their experience suggests that women in manufacturing will be just as capable of doing that and will benefit from the increased opportunities that greater flexibility and removal of discrimination will bring. The repeals will also lift an unjustifiable burden from employers and will help to promote enterprise and ultimately employment, which is the Government's fundamental aim.

To sum up, this Bill will promote equal opportunities and flexibility in employment and will remove some unnecessary bureaucracy. It is another step along the path to equality, and as such I am proud to be identified with it. I commend it to the House.

5.49 pm

Ms. Jo Richardson (Barking): The Minister was blindly complacent about women's rights. If the Bill is an example of the Government's attitude to those rights I am glad that we shall have an election within the next 12 months or so and get a different Government.

It is a sad coincidence that we should be discussing this particularly bad Bill this year, because 1986 marks the publication of the Equal Opportunities Commission's 10th annual report. Considering what the EOC has said about the Bill and the rearguard action that the present chairperson had to mount in another place, the report has an ironic subtitle:

"So much to build on".

Needless to say, it went to press full of optimism that its advice to the Government on the provisions dealing with protective legislation would be heeded. The commission must now be feeling decidedly pessimistic.

As the full implications of this ragbag of a Bill have gradually unfolded, its true purpose has emerged ever more strongly. It is clear that it has nothing to do with real equality for women. After a decade of sex equality legislation—introduced by a Labour Government—the Government have thrown away a golden opportunity to review and amend the legislation positively and constructively.

Labour Members recognised that such unique legislation—as it was at the time—would have its imperfections. Indeed, I was a member of the Standing Committee that considered the original Sex Discrimination Bill and I recall that, as a Government Back Bencher, I pointed out some of the imperfections in it. I know that if we had a Labour Government today those imperfections would be put right.

Equally important, we knew that the legislation would need constant review and amendment in the wake of case law and changing expectations. The Equal Opportunities Commission, which was established simultaneously with the enactment of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 and the amendments to the Equal Pay Act 1970, was enjoined to keep both Acts under review and, where necessary, to report to Parliament with recommendations for change.

In addition, throughout the past decade individual women, women in the labour movement and women's organisations have drawn attention to the deficiencies and weaknesses which have been found, through practice and experience, to exist in the original legislation.

There has also been a growing awareness of the need for positive action—I shall repeat that for the benefit of Conservative Members who do not know the difference between positive action and positive discrimination; it is displeasing to see the empty Government Benches following our previous riveting debate. There has been a growing awareness of the positive action that must be taken to ensure that equality for women means real equality rather than a paper commitment to an abstract concept.

Positive action means, for example, the provision of creches in Manpower Service Commission skillcentres, which the Government have consistently obstructed; it means removing the punitive tax that the Government introduced on workplace nursery places; it means encouraging affordable, reliable, safe and accountable public transport, which the Government are attempting to destroy; it means extending employment rights and benefits to part-time workers — almost exclusively women — whose rights are being systematically wiped out by the Government; it means implementing the EEC directive on parental and family leave, restoring maternity rights and benefits, which the Government have ruthlessly plundered, and allowing local authorities to raise their rates to provide the real care in the community which women need to be able to exercise their right to work.

Positive action also means adopting equal opportunities policies throughout the public sector, promoted by contract compliance to educate and bring in line the private sector. It also means eradicating the discrimination that riddles our tax and security system—a task which the Government's Green Paper on taxation reform and their Social Security Act 1986 have singularly failed to perform.

I am conscious of the shortage of time for the debate because of the intrusion of the previous debate. My list could go on and on, yet what is the Government's reply? They have introduced a ragbag of grudging, partial provision with only minimum compliance with changes that have been forced upon them, and they have repealed protective legislation to level down protection for women and men, which has been pressed for by no one.

I emphasise that not one organisation with expertise in anti-discrimination and health and safety laws has requested or advocated the total repeal of that protective legislation. It is the epitome of negative action and the Conservative Members in Standing Committee seemed to have no trouble understanding that concept.

The Government have ignored all advice and have blocked every attempt to provide measures to level up, equalise and improve the conditions of all workers employed in the sectors covered by the Bill. I shall await with great interest a statement from the new Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security with special responsibility for women's health on her views on the implications for women's health when women in the manufacturing sector and the baking industry are forced to work double day shifts, weekends and bank holidays, includng Christmas day, with no code of practice governing the introduction of such enforced changes and no right of appeal for unfair dismissal. I hope that the new Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), who served on the Standing Committee on the Bill before her elevation, will keep the matter under close scrutiny, because the Government have failed in their duty to women by forcing through this legislation.

We are advised that clause 1 is unnecessarily wide and may lead to costly litigation and conflicting rulings. Clauses 2 and 3 introduce provisions which will lead to discrimination against men over 60, perpetuate discrimination against women in redundancy rights and create even more anomalies and uncertainty over retirement-related fringe benefits.

Clause 4 will need careful monitoring to ensure that it is not abused. Clause 5 merely closes one small gap in the yawning chasm which section 51 of the Sex Discrimination Act has become and which, together with the Marshall ruling, is a prime example of where further positive action must be taken.

We are advised that the outcome of clause 6 will be random and uncertain, as it fails to provide any mechanism to deal properly with its provisions. Clauses 7 and 8 effectively wipe out any claims that the Government may have wanted to make for themselves as responsive or caring.

The Government's obstinate refusal, against the advice of the EOC and all the trade unions involved, to equalise protection upwards exposes their complete lack of understanding of real equality—equality which improves the quality of life in the workplace, in the home and in the community.

The attitude that has been displayed and some of the views that have been expressed during our debates in Committee and in the Chamber by some Conservative Members, one of whom stated that he would be happy to see the Sex Discrimination Act and the Equal Pay Act scrapped—a mind-boggling prospect—do not augur well for the review of the Acts which the EOC has recently announced that it intends to conduct. The task of the EOC will be made all the more difficult by the passing of this shoddy Bill, and the Government's refusal to accept the EOC's recommendations on so many aspects of the Bill must fill the Commission with trepidation about future reviews.

I am pleased to say that we in the Opposition have already taken on board all the issues that the EOC has outlined in its review and much more as a priority for the legislative programme that will be brought forward by our Ministry for women. That Ministry will be established when we get a Labour Government and such a Ministry cannot come soon enough for the women of Britain. The next EOC report after this Government have gone may have to be subtitled "Building from the Ruins". A Labour Government will be prepared to undertake that task. We oppose this Bill and will vote against it. We eagerly await the day when we can start rebuilding and giving women the opportunities and the back-up that they need.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): In recognition of the reduced amount of time for this debate, and in deference to hon. Members who have spent much more time on this Bill than I have, and for some of whom I deputise today, I shall make just one or two comments on this measure.

The Bill is a small measure in relation to one of the biggest issues of our day—the institutional discrimination against women which deprives our community, our employers and this House of a contribution that we can ill afford to miss. The Bill misses many opportunities to redress imbalances. Like the hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson), I regret that the Government's way of achieving equality in the baking industry is to reduce protection rather than to increase it. It is not in accord with the present realities facing trade unions to suggest that simply by removing their protection women will be able to negotiate better conditions in the baking industry. That is not the case, and it is not something of which the unions are particularly proud. To put anyone in that position by legislation is reprehensible.

Many other measures are required to enable equality to be a reality for women, as opposed to simply trying to abolish discrimination. The existing legislation fails to address any of the problems. Some small points in the Bill are worthy of support, and for that reason the Bill is just about worthy of support, but only just.

6.2 pm

Mr. Ian Mikardo (Bow and Poplar): The one good thing about the Bill is its title. It has been the habit of the Government to misdescribe most of the Bills that they have introduced. They introduced a trade union-bashing Bill and called it an employment Bill. It had nothing to do with employment, because not only did it not create a single job, but it actually reduced the number of jobs. They introduced an erosion of civil liberties Bill and called it the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill. They introduced an emasculation of wages councils Bill and called it a Wages Bill. At least this Bill has an honest title, because in the same way as a Finance Bill is for finance, and the Consolidated Fund Bill deals with the Consolidated Fund, so this sex discrimination Bill is for sex discrimination. Its long title ought to begin, "A Bill for the purposes of creating or, where it already exists, of enhancing sex discrimination."

Contrary views have been expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House about the purpose of and motivation for the Bill. The Government's argument is that it will sweep away old-time legislation and, in certain circumstances, equalise the conditions of women and men. That was the line taken last night by the right hon. and learned Gentleman—I have forgotten his title—[AN HON. MEMBER: "The Paymaster General."]—Yes, the Paymaster General. I ought not to have forgotten his title, because he lives much in my consciousness. He has a smooth oleaginous line of patter which reminds me of a chap from my boyhood days who used to sell gold watches for half a crown at mock auctions, or run out markets as we used to call them. The Paymaster General reminds me of that sort of sale.

The equality argument is put forward by the Government, but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) said, we know what this Bill is about. It will tip the employer-employee relationship even further in the interests of the employer and weaken the already weak bargaining power of workers who are already weak because there are 4 million people unemployed. It will weaken especially the bargaining power of women workers.

There are two interpretations of what will be the effect of the Bill. How would an impartial person judge its effect? What evidence is there on the basis of which an impartial person could judge between the two interpretations? I suggest that there is one piece of evidence, because the Government gave the game away when they refused to accept new clause 1. That clause, which we put forward, would have left it to women workers to decide whether they wanted to be equal in status and equal in opportunity to earn more money by way of overtime or weekend work at the cost of leisure and safety, and at the cost of worsening their environmental conditions and of having to queue at bus stops at midnight on their way home from double day shifts.

If the motivation for the Bill is what the Government say it is, matters should be left for women to decide. After all, the Government are much in favour of secret ballots and in favour of a woman worker having the right to express an opinion on such a major question as who is to represent her on the executive of her trade union. They are in favour of a woman worker having the right to express an opinion about whether her shop shall be a pre-entry closed shop, a post-entry closed shop or a non-closed shop — matters which many women probably do not understand at all. On such marginal things as how long she has to work each day, on how many hours she will be required to work without a break, whether she can be required to work at weekends or on Christmas day, and whether she will be required to work in unfavourable and unsafe environmental conditions she has no say at all.

If the Government were really seeking to improve women's conditions, they would have said yes to a ballot. They are talking about liberalising women. There is one great piece of liberalisation that anybody can confer, and it is the right for people to have a say in decisions that affect their lives and welfare and the lives and welfare of their families. The Government have denied that right, and that throws into question all their bona fides and the smooth talk of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Paymaster General and the ostensible reasons — which are not the real reasons — that the Government put forward for the Bill.

I shall make two more points about the Government's case. A quick look at each of them shows that they do not hold water. The Government ask us why we worry, because if anybody is done by unfairly she can always go to an industrial tribunal. I shall not go over the ground that we covered yesterday about industrial tribunals, because we demonstrated beyond peradventure that they are difficult and expensive of access and will probably be made more difficult and more expensive. Even when one reaches a tribunal one finds that it does not run very well, because in many cases the people who run tribunals are not very well qualified to deal with the problems that come before them and are scarcely qualified at all in any understanding of sex discrimination.

A right of appeal has been taken away from women workers. Even under the stress of war in 1940, when we were facing what most people thought was the imminent danger of defeat and being overrun, we still allowed an appeal from the chap who said that his creed did not permit him to fight. We allowed him to appeal even in that terrible, critical and dangerous situation.

The Minister could not answer me yesterday when I raised a question on that point, so I shall now answer it myself. A lady of deep, devout Christian conviction, who, as a result of the Bill, was for the first time required to work on a Sunday and refused to do so and was then sacked—as she could be under the Bill—would have no right of appeal. She would not have the same right of appeal on the grounds of conscience and faith as young men had in 1940 against conscription. That is absolutely disgraceful.

The Government ask why we bother about these matters and why we do not leave them to be settled, not by law, but by negotiation between trades unions and employers. There are a number of sweat shops in my constituency. A large number of women work in the needle trades, many of them part-time in small establishments or at home, and they have no protection. They are virtually ununionised, partly because they work in small establishments, which makes a union difficult to organise, partly because there is a rapid turnover of personnel, which also makes a union difficult to organise, and partly because many of them are immigrants whose knowledge of the language is not good. For those reasons and others, there is little trade union organisation.

How does some poor girl on her own face an employer and negotiate with him? The hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) was right to say that it is nonsense in present-day circumstances to talk about the negotiating process as one of negotiation between equals. The 4 million people unemployed have completely destroyed that. The queue of people at the factory gates cuts off the negotiating limbs of those inside the factory.

All the grounds that the Government have put forward in favour of the Bill, all the grounds that they have put forward to fend off our criticisms, are nothing but pretence. It is a pretence that the purpose of the Bill is anything other than to worsen the conditions of women workers; it is a pretence that any injustice is covered by the protection of industrial tribunals; and it is a pretence that we can leave these matters to free and equal negotiation. Under any sort of examination, the Government's case falls apart.

Mrs. Llin Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I shall speak briefly on the clauses that affect women bakery workers and their families. The bulk of women who work in the baking industry in my constituency wish to put their families first. They are good wives and good mothers and they work because they have to—they need the money. The effects of this Bill on their family lives should not be ignored. It is no use the Government deploring the break-up of families and juvenile delinquency with one breath, while with the other they force mothers to work nights.

Night working for women brings particular problems in trying to manage both the home and the family. Children need their mothers, and husbands — at least most of them—need their wives. Child care provision is difficult enough for mothers to obtain during the day—during the night it is virtually impossible, if not non-existent. They face the problem of caring for the family and trying to snatch a few hours' sleep during the day in houses that are not insulated against noise, and that puts an added strain on them.

In my constituency the problem of sleeping during the day is very real and is made very much worse by the open-cast wagons running around the roads in ever-increasing numbers. The lack of money available to councils to insulate council houses against such noise is an issue that we must consider when discussing night working, especially for women. The bulk of women in my constituency do not like night working, either for themselves or for their husbands. They do not want their social and family life to be diminished—yet that will be the effect of the Bill.

I hope that the Minister will realise that tired women are an added health risk in factories. It is not too late for him to change his mind, and I hope that he does so.

6.16 pm

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding) on raising an important point about people who work shifts and at night facing the problem of establishing normal sleeping patterns during the day. That applies especially to women, many of whom have to contend with young children. I am sure that my hon. Friend's comments reflect the views of many women who will be affected by the Bill.

In what is, for obvious reasons, a rather short Third Reading debate it is germane for me to make it clear immediately that the Opposition will divide the House and vote against the Bill. We shall do so, not because we disagree with everything contained in the Bill — we concur with certain parts of it — but because the Government have used it to introduce deregulation. Throughout the Committee and Report stages we argued that such deregulation should not be enacted, and we continue to oppose that on Third Reading.

The Opposition welcome parts of clauses 2 and 3 as a proper response to the European Court's decision in the Helen Marshall case. It is right once again to put on record the congratulations of the House to Miss Marshall on her determination in taking her case all the way to the European Court and winning it, thereby materially altering the lives of many women.

We are still, however, concerned about some aspects of the clauses. The first is the timing of the implementation of the changes. Clause 10 provides that those clauses will not be implemented within 12 months of the passing of the Act. That means that the inequalities and inequities that the clauses are meant to remove will legally be in force for the next 12 months, thus providing an opportunity for women to continue to be discriminated against. The Government could enact the clauses much more quickly than they propose. We have never had a proper explanation of why we have to wait 12 months.

Another matter of concern is the inequality in the eligibility for state pensions. The Equal Opportunities Commission said that it remains "very concerned at the failure to tackle the anomalies and differences in treatment between men and women which result from the unequal state pension age. For example, a woman between the ages of 60 and 64 will have the option of deferring retirement beyond the state pension age. She will be required no longer to pay the national insurance contributions and her eventual state pension entitlement will be enhanced for each year of employment over the age of 60. In contrast, a man will gain no such option. It was accepted by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Ian Lang) during the Committee stage of the Bill (column 192) that 'we all agree that discrimination in retirement will not be eliminated until there are equal state pension ages for men and women'."

Of course, the Government have ignored that aspect completely. I suspect that we could have further representations in the courts on this issue.

On the issue of redundancy payments, the EOC argued:

"Women will continue to be discriminated against on the the grounds of sex, in that they will cease to be eligible for a redundancy payment at age 60 . . . The Government regards the provision of redundancy payments as a matter falling under the EEC Social Security Directive and not under the Equal Treatment Directive. The Commission doubts whether this is a proper interpretation of the position under European Community law and notes that the European Court of Justice has recently reiterated the fundamental importance of the principle of equality of treatment between men and women. The Court has given strict interpretation to clauses in the Equal Treatment Directive which derogate from that principle, in particular Article 1(2) which purports to remove issues of Social Security from that Directive."

That was from the EOC newsletter of October 1986.

Finally, in relation to other associated benefits, the EOC states:

"A second defect of these clauses is the omission from paragraphs (a) to (c) of Clause 2(1) of words which appear in the comparable paragraphs of s.6(1) and (2) of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 dealing with access to benefits, facilities or services and subjecting a person to any other detriment. The Government intends that sex discrimination shall continue to be lawful to the extent that these issues are related to death or retirement."

I submit to the House that the Government should have tackled these issues during the passage of a Bill which purports to deal with sex discrimination.

Clause 7 deals with the removal of restrictions on working hours and conditions of women. That lies at the heart of the Bill. We have reiterated all the arguments in Committee and on Report, and we have made it clear that what the Government are doing, which will worsen the conditions of work for men, and especially for women, is entirely unacceptable, and we will certainly oppose the Bill.

Clause 8 deals with the repeal of the Baking Industry (Hours of Work) Act 1954. The repeal of that Act is doubly injudicious. Not only do the arguments about worsening the conditions of workers apply here, but there was not, and never has been, any demand for the repeal of the Act from workers or employers. Any anomolies in the Act could have been righted, in most cases, simply by applying its provisions equally to men and women, rather than by removing the Act entirely and reducing the conditions of work of male and female employees to the lowest common denominator.

Although the Government maintain that the Act is outdated and no longer necessary for the well-being of the industry and the workers within the industry, it is clear that the real reason behind its removal is that the alternative—extending the Act to cover women—would go against the Government's avowed intention to remove so-called bureaucracy and barriers to efficiency in business. It is in keeping with the general tenet of the Bill — if in doubt, scrap it. The Government argue that repealing the Act will have no effect on the conditions and hours of the work force in the baking industry. If that is the case, why are they trying to scrap it? In reality, they know that it will have a fundamental and negative effect on the work force. It plays into the hands of unscrupulous employers, who will use the opportunity to exploit the work force even more than at present.

A survey conducted by the Bakers, Food and Allied Workers' Union found that the weekly average working hours in the industry amounted to 64 hours for dayshift and 63 hours for nightshift. In two large bakeries, they found 72 hours to be the average. The Government's own figures show that at least 30 per cent. of the work force in the industry are still covered directly by the terms of the 1954 Act. The other 70 per cent. may very well work under separate, negotiated agreements, but these agreements are based on the 1954 Act, and its removal, coupled with fierce competition within the industry, will lead very quickly to employers enforcing new agreements which will be less advantageous to workers in terms of their working conditions, but very much more advantageous to the Government's friends, the employers, in terms of their renewed ability to increase profits.

Yesterday, a petition signed by over 2,000 workers in the baking industry was presented to Parliament. It expressed the view, very clearly, that the repeal of the Act was not desired by, nor is felt to be in the interest of, the work force affected. The Act was the result of 10 years of pressure from workers in the industry expressing the same sentiments. It also followed four inquiries into the effects of abolishing bakery nightwork. In less than one year, and without any substantial body of opinion to that effect, the Government are planning in this Bill to abolish the Act and thereby make bakers' lives more hazardous. For that reason, and the other reasons that I have outlined, the Opposition will vote against the Bill.

Mr. Lee: The Bill makes a number of changes which will help to improve the position of women in employment and secure for them the effective equal opportunities which we all wish to see. Although the European Community has played a part in this development, I see it as essentially a continuation of the movement towards the removal of unfair sex discrimination and the promotion of equal opportunities between men and women which has been supported by both sides of the House and to which this Government have been firmly committed.

Perhaps, I could mention just one change to which I attach great importance and which will I believe significantly improve the position of women at work both in the short and the long-term. That is the removal of discrimination in retirement ages following the Marshall judgment on which the Government acted with commendable speed. As I explained in my opening remarks, we consider it necessary to provide for a short period of 12 months after the Royal Assent for employers to make the changes in their retirement arrangements which will be needed. I should like to repeat my view that it will be in the interests both of employers and all their employees to remove, as soon as possible this long outdated anomaly of requiring a woman who wishes to continue working to retire in circumstances where a man can stay on. I am therefore heartened to hear of firms including Securicor, Mecca and the Prudential which are already taking steps to equalise their retirement ages and hope that many more will follow their example during the next few months without waiting until the last moment before the requirement comes into operation.

That does not contradict in any way the Government's aim of improving the competitiveness and efficiency of the economy. On the contrary, it must serve the ends of sound business practice as well as of justice between the sexes to ensure that the best use is made of all available skills and talents. I am therefore pleased to note the support which has been given to the general aims of the Bill, despite differences on individual provisions. The Bill is sensible and progressive, adds to labour market flexibility and should be warmly welcomed. I commend it to the House.

Salmon Bill [Lords]

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

6.40 pm

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Most of us who have been involved with the Bill from the beginning, and others in another place, would say that one of the most important issues of the Bill is drift netting. It is unfortunate that the only amendment dealing with drift netting has not been selected.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is aware that Mr. Speaker, before he makes his selection, takes all factors into consideration, including matters which have been discussed at earlier stages of the Bill. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman with his well known ingenuity will find that some of the selected new clauses and amendments will allow him to make his points.

Mr. James Tinn (Redcar): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As someone with a similar interest to that of the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) but with a different point of view, may I ask that we shall have the Chair's indulgence in our ingenuity?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman must not stretch my words that far. I said that it may be that the hon. Gentleman's points would be in order on other new clauses or amendments. However, we must judge that when we come to it.

DISCLOSURE OF INFORMATION FURNISHED UNDER THE DISEASES OF FISH ACT 1983

'(1) In subsection (1) of section 9 of the Diseases of Fish Act 1983 (disclosure of information obtained in pursuance of section 7 of that Act), after paragraph (c) there shall be inserted the words "or

(d) for the purpose of enabling a water authority to carry out any of their functions under the 1937 Act.".'.—[Mr. Gummer.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following: New clause 2—Measures relating to the prevention of disease among fish—

'(1) Notwithstanding and without prejudice to the provisions of section 30 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975 ("Introduction of fish into inland waters"), any person who knowingly supplies any fish or spawn of fish to another for the purpose of the introduction of that spawn or fish into an inland water in circumstances where the written consent of the water authority within whose area any part of the water is situated has not been obtained under section 30 aforesaid, shall be guilty of an offence, punishable on summary conviction with a fine not exceeding level 4 on the standard scale.

(2) In subsection (1) of section 9 of the Diseases of Fish Act 1983 ("Disclosure of Information"), there shall be added the following paragraph—

"(d) for the purpose of enabling a water authority to enforce the provisions of this Act and the 1937 Act in fulfilment of its duty to maintain, improve and develop fisheries within its area by virtue of paragraph (a) of subsection (1) of section 28 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975.".'.

Government amendment No. 33.

Amendment No. 34, in clause 33, page 28, line 28, after 'introduce', insert

'in respect of salmon or trout'.

Amendment No. 35, in clause 33, page 28, line 29, at end insert

'which is not in any way connected either directly or indirectly to a river'.

Government amendments Nos. 49, 50, 53 and 54.

Mr. Gummer: We have had an extremely interesting debate in Committee on a whole range of issues. I undertook to listen carefully to what was said to see whether we could meet some of the points raised by hon. Members from both sides of the House. One of those points is covered in new clause 10.

The clause concerns the disclosure of information collected under the fish farm registration scheme. That scheme was very properly set up for specific purposes. Parliament restricted the situations in which the information gathered under the scheme could be disclosed. My hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) and other of my right hon. and hon. Friends stated that the scheme did not meet a particular need in combating fish disease because there were circumstances in which water authorities might need the information gathered under the registration scheme. As authorities have functions relating to the control of fish disease, it seemed correct, as fish disease is of such great importance even though few instances were involved, that we should meet the contention so helpfully put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Woking. Therefore, new clause 10 will allow such information to be given to water authorities where the authorities can show that they need the information to fulfill their responsibilities under the Fish Act 1937. I believe that the National Farmers Union will be content with that approach in principle. I therefore hope that the new clause will be accepted by the House.

New clause 2 has two parts. I hope that the second part will become redundant under the circumstances of the proposed new clause 10. The first part deals with the offence of supplying live fish to a customer who has not obtained water authority consent to introduce the fish to an inland water if the supplier knew that the consent had not been obtained. I assume that my hon. Friend the Member for Woking does not intend the supplier to be prosecuted merely for failing to ask the customer whether he had obtained the necessary consent. That would be out of proportion to the original offence on the customer's part. We have to assume that the supplier knew that the customer did not have the water authority consent to introduce the fish and that therefore an offence was commited under section 30 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975. In those circumstances, the criminal law already provides for the supplier to be prosecuted for aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the commission of an offence under section 44 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980. The subsection is unnecessary.

Some hon. Members have suggested that the subsection is necessary. My hon. Friend the Member for Woking has drawn my attention this evening to the anxiety which one water authority has in that matter. I have looked at the case as carefully as has been possible in the short time since that anxiety was expressed, but my advice is that section 30 of the 1975 Act would, in the circumstances which the water authority has raised with my hon. Friend the Member for Woking, meet the case.

However, the Government's intention is to meet the worries which lie behind the first part of new clause 2. Obviously I will consider the matter further to see whether action should be taken. I believe that the subsection is unnecessary and I hope that we will cover the second part of the new clause 2 in new clause 10. I therefore hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Woking will be willing to withdraw his proposed new clause 2.

Government amendment 33 covers section 30 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975. That makes it an offence to introduce fish or spawn into any inland water without the consent of the relevant water authorities. There is no right of appeal if the water authority says no.

Water authorities have a statutory duty to maintain, improve and develop the fisheries in their areas. The Government therefore accept that controls under section 30 of the 1975 Act are necessary to prevent release into rivers and other waterways of fish which could damage the existing fish population, for example, pike into a salmon stream. We consider, however, that section 30 represents a considerable and unnecessary burden for the general run of fish farms.

Deregulation forms an important part of Government policy and we shall take appropriate opportunities to remove unnecessary restrictions. That is what clause 33 seeks to achieve. There is no doctrinal view that we should remove regulation where it is valuable. My hon. Friend the Member for Woking and others have raised the point that there are circumstances in which the measure, which was not originally seen as a measure for the protection of fish and the elimination of fish disease, might be helpful. It might be helpful where there is a direct connection between a fish farm and other inland water where that connection might be a source of disease.

Under the amendment, we intend to retain the controls under section 30 of the 1975 Act on the introduction of fish or spawn into fish farms operating in cages or netted-off sections of rivers or other waterways. There are grounds for retaining controls on such sites because they are not insulated from other inland waters. The amendment would cover that area of real concern.

I know that my hon. Friends sometimes feel that we ought to go further and deal with cases where there is a connection with a conduit or ditch. Generally, fish farms connected by conduits come under water authority control because they will need the authority's consent to discharge effluent under the Control of Pollution Act 1974. I do not believe that the alternative amendments proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Woking are necessary. If my hon. Friend's amendments were accepted, the only people who would no longer have the extra burden of section 30 would be those with fish farms completely unconnected to a river. Therefore, section 30 would continue to apply to the overwhelming majority of fish farms, most of which are connected to a river by a conduit. I do not believe that such control should continue to be applied to these sites. As I have said, these measures were not introduced to control disease, but ever since they were introduced we have shown increasing concern about fish disease.

There is legislative back-up for the action that we wish to take. We are extremely strict on occasions when we feel that there is a danger of increased fish disease. But we do not believe that this control is any longer necessary on that ground, and it is certainly not necessary on any other grounds. However, we accept the point made by my hon.

[Mr. Gummer]

Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow), and in the light of what we have been able to do I hope that he will accept the change that we have made.

I know that hon. Members feel strongly about fish disease. It is of enormous importance. We do not think that new clause 2 is the way to deal with the problem. We have the Diseases of Fish Acts which vest the principal responsibility in Ministers. It is important to do what we can under the legislation to place very tight controls on the movement of fish and eggs that are or may be infected by serious diseases.

It is important to reiterate the Government's absolute commitment to continue with the tough and tight controls on fish and eggs in order to ensure that we protect the stock. In view of what I have said, I hope that the House will agree to Government amendment No. 33 and that my hon. Friend the Member for Woking will withdraw amendments Nos. 34 and 35.

I think that we have the right balance between deregulation of a part of the Act that was not introduced for this purpose — but which some water authorities have found useful for part of the purpose — and the retention of that part that they may find useful.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): The Opposition welcome the notion of disclosing information under the fish farm registration scheme. If powers have been granted to the water authorities, it seems quite absurd that earlier legislation has prevented the dissemination of the information that is needed in order to carry out their functions.

However, I wonder whether this measure goes far enough in the way in which it attempts to combat fish disease. I agree with the Minister completely that this is a very important matter, but do the new clause and disclosure do enough to stop disease, and do the water authorities have all the powers that they need in order to carry out this work?

I should like to paraphrase part of a letter that I have received from Dr. Ron Linfield of the Anglia water authority. He said that to improve our capability to enforce controls over both fish diseases and the introduction of alien or exotic species we needed an amendment to either section 7 or section 9 of the Diseases of Fish Act 1983. That would create for water authority officers with particular responsibility for carrying out statutory fishery functions a right of access to the fish farm register and associated movement records held at each farm. He said that the amendment we needed to give special recognition to the role of the water authorities gave the general prohibition on disclosure of information by the MAFF that it had created in section 9. Does this go far enough or should not the new clause have been more comprehensive in order to restrict the spread of fish disease?

The Minister said that inland waters could be connected by means of conduit, but are rivers covered? Inland waters can be connected to other inland waters, but what happens when an inland water is connected to a river? That could surely be a source of disease.

We agree that the control of fish disease is crucial and we completely support the notion that there should be restrictions on the movement of fish as well as other controls.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for going a limited way towards meeting the amendments that I tabled. They are not a whim of my own but represent the collective view of the water authorities.

In general there seems to be a wide gulf between my right hon. Friend's Department and the water authorities over fish farms. In my experience, water authorities are in general not quite as happy to be persuaded by the NFU — the spokesman for the fish farms — as the MAFF sometimes appears to be. Perhaps I am being unfair to my right hon. Friend's officials—I probably am from time to time—but I think that a strong case is building up for a complete reform of the law relating to fish farms, not merely in respect of disease but also in respect of pollution, planning and other aspects of fish farming. We can perhaps return to that on another occasion as it will not be debated tonight.

My right hon. Friend has half met the intention of new clause 2. The half that he has not met should be taken a bit more seriously. Although I recognise that the correspondence that I put into my right hon. Friend's hands only half an hour ago—which came to me shortly before that from Dr. Linfield of Anglia—is difficult to digest, it nevertheless bears out the need for action in this area.

A particular case that the Severn-Trent water authority drew to Dr. Linfield's attention is an example of the sort of thing that happens under the law as it stands, and it is likely to happen more frequently after the law has been changed. In this case the North West water authority issued a consent for trout to be introduced into a farm in its region from a trout farm in Somerset. This source was cleared by the Ministry and the South West water authority, and the consent was issued. The fish were supplied but did not come from Somerset. The supplier named in the consent, in addition to being a fish farmer, also carried live fish about by way of trade, and he obtained them not from his own farm in Somerset but from a farm in Nottinghamshire belonging to the Severn-Trent water authority which was not informed of the destination of the fish.

When the fish were delivered to the site in the north-west, a fish disease was diagnosed shortly afterwards which was attributed to the supplying farm. The Severn-Trent water authority thought that was unfair, but when the whole matter was looked at it subsequently emerged that a different consignment of fish, for which consent was issued on the understanding that the supplier would be providing them, was in fact supplied from quite a different fish farm.

The complexity revealed in that brief summary shows that there must be precious little effective control in this area by MAFF officials and very little scope for relaxation if there is to be effective prevention of the spread of fish disease.

I wish that we had been able to go over this in greater depth in Committee——

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Raise it in the 1922 Committee.

Mr. Onslow: I wish that the hon. Gentleman would not make stupid observations. When he is on his feet he is bad enough, and when he remains seated he is quite absurd.

I do not believe that my right hon. Friend's officials can be relying on the support of the water authorities for the brief which they have given him. I doubt whether those interested parties outside official bodies, who take great interest and show much concern about river pollution, would endorse what my right hon. Friend has said. The adequacy of the Control of Pollution Act 1974 is strongly contested by bodies such as the Anglers Co-operative Association, of which I am a council member. It takes a close interest in these matters and is better informed than many water authorities. I ask my right hon. Friend to ask his officials to give him the details of the West Beck case. That case illustrates how dangerous the pollution problem can be and how important it is to keep tight control over fish farms and the quality of the water which they release into our rivers.

Evidently my right hon. Friend will not be persuaded. I would let amendments Nos. 34 and 35 go by without calling upon him to make any further comment, but I must ask him to answer my queries concerning new clause 2. I await, with interest, what he has to say.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I am glad that the hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) is being persistent in this matter, because it is a cause of concern in many parts of the House. The potential for the spread of disease or the arrival of unwelcome species of fish is great. One only has to consider what happened when mink escaped into the wild in some parts of the country to realise that dangers could exist in the rivers.

I echo the hon. Gentleman's thanks to the Government for going some way but I cannot understand why the Government do not want to make these provisions as tight and reliable as possible. The Government, at a time of expansion in fish farming, should make sure that there is maximum control in these matters, as such expansion poses many dangers.

Many new entrepreneurs are attracted to the business and there are good people involved in the industry. If expansion is taking place, who knows whom it will attract? It is important that the water authorities should be able to control the situation. The fears which have been expressed by the hon. Member for Woking must not be realised. Our salmon and trout must not be endangered. I urge the Minister to listen carefully to the arguments presented to him by the hon. Member.

Mr. Gummer: In reply to the questions posed by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall), we believe that the amendments go far enough to provide the information which is needed by water authorities to undertake their responsibilities under the Diseases of Fish Act 1983. If we did not believe that, we would have phrased the amendments in a different way. The hon. Gentleman was right to ask a direct question and he has got a direct answer.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West expressed concern about the phrase "inland waters". We used that phrase because, in law, they do include rivers, lakes, reservoirs, streams, etc. Rather than put all those words in, the phrase "inland waters" was used. I am sure that, in legal parlance, that phrase will cover all the examples.

The reason that conduits are mentioned——

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): Cundies.

Mr. Gummer: Is that what I have to say to the Scots? I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. In fact I would not say it in Scots because there are few examples of this type of fish farm in Scotland. Therefore, in this case I may use the English term.

A conduit refers to a particular kind of connection other than a ditch. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West was concerned that we should get the parlance right and I shall not tease him by asking whether he knows where rivers come or go. Nevertheless, one must specify both conduits and ditches. Conduits, in some cases, link the fish farms to the river and they are affected by the Control of Pollution Act 1974. The fears of the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) would be realised if we were suggesting a removal of control which lessened our power to deal with pollution. I have studied this matter in great detail.

The problem between my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) and myself is that we have a differing view about whether this provision gives the additional protection necessary for the elimination and containment of fish diseases. That is the issue and it is a difficult one to resolve because we have both looked at the same facts and come to different conclusions.

I have had time to study the West Beck case. As it stands, there is breach of water authorities' consent under section 30 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975. If the supplier knows that the appropriate consent is not being complied with, the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980 makes it an offence to aid and abet in these circumstances. In this case, the supplier and the receiver are committing an offence.

The difficulty is that the legislation which we are largely rescinding under this Bill was enacted not for the protection of fish from disease but for other reasons. Those other reason are not now prayed in aid of retention: what we do pray in aid is the legislation's usefulnes in preventing disease from spreading.

I see no reason for retaining any more of the legislation than that part which will continue to be useful. If I thought that by retaining more of it, or all of it, we would in any way improve the protection of fish from disease, I would agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Woking. I have not been so persuaded, and I do not believe that the House should be. Although I have studied the West Beck case with care, I shall reconsider it. If I find that there is some information therein of which I was not aware I will have further discussions with my hon. Friend concerning the matter.

USE OF BAITS AND LURES

'.—(1) The Secretary of State may, subject to the provisions of this section, make regulations specifying baits and lures for the purposes of the definition of "rod and line" in section 24 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries (Protection) (Scotland) Act 1951.

(2) The Secretary of State may make regulations under this section only on—

(a) application to him by a district salmon fishery board; or

(b) a joint application to him by more than one such board, and regulations made in respect of such application shall be made only in respect of the district of the applicant.

[Mr. Gummer]

(3) Regulations under this section shall specify, subject to such exceptions as may be provided therein, all or any, or a combination of, the following:—

(a) baits and lures or classes of baits and lures;

(b) times when the regulations apply;

(c) areas to which the regulations apply.

(4) An application under subsection (2) above shall be accompanied by the applicant's written proposals which shall state—

(a) the baits and lures which it is proposed should be specified;

(b) the places to which and the times during which the proposed regulations should apply; and

(c) the reasons for the proposals.

(5) Paragraphs 3 to 9 of Schedule 1 to this Act shall apply to the making of regulations under this section as they apply to the making of a designation order, and for this purpose—

(a) references to a designation order shall be construed as references to regulations under this section; and

(b) references to an applicant, and to an application, under paragraph 1 shall be construed respectively as references to an applicant, and to an application, under subsection (2) above.

(6) In section 24(1) of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries (Protection) (Scotland) Act 1951, at the end of the definition of "rod and line" there shall be inserted the following—"and, in the case of fishing for salmon in an area to which and at a time during which regulations made under section (use of baits and lures) of the Salmon Act 1986 apply, is not specified in such regulations in respect of that area and time".'.—[Mr. John MacKay.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. John MacKay): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 8 to 10.

Mr. MacKay: New clause 7 and the related consequential amendments Nos. 8 and 9 provide the regulation-making provision for baits and lures which I promised at Committee stage when considering an amendment proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro). It is a clause much in the style of clause 6—the annual close time clause—in that it rests upon local initiative to start the ball rolling where there is a perceived need for some control over baits and lures.

Although under the clause regulations would be made by the Secretary of State at the request of a district board or boards, there are safeguards for those who may be affected or who may consider that regulation is unnecessary in the relevant district or districts. First, there will have to be some local consideration and discussion in the board and, of course, I remind the House, anglers will have a say because of their representation on the new boards. In addition, a baits and lures regulation would have to go through all the statutory procedures for designation and annual close time orders which require the Secretary of State to consult; to cause the proposals to be advertised; and to hold a public inquiry if he considers it necessary. There are therefore many safeguards against the possibility of capricious or ill-thought-out proposals being introduced. I believe that they are sufficient.

The Association of District Salmon Fishery Boards and the Salmon and Trout Association support the idea of powers to control the use of baits and lures. In discussion with officials of the Department, representatives of the Scottish Anglers National Association were somewhat ambivalent, seeing advantage in some control, for example, on the use of shrimp or prawn, but unhappy about the risk of prohibition of the use of the worm in some Highland areas.

I hope that those who fear that they might be adversely affected by unreasonable regulations will be reassured by the arrangements for detailed consideration that are provided in the clause. There will be ample opportunity for opinions to be made known and taken into account before the Secretary of State decides to make any particular regulation or not. It should be noted that district boards have the power only to ask for regulations, not to make them, and also that regulations can be made for part of a district so that, for example, the upper waters of the river can be treated differently from the lower waters.

Amendment No. 10 is a minor, technical amendment to correct an existing omission. It gives my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State the power to amend section 10 of the Tweed Fisheries Amendment Act 1859 as well as sections 6 and 11 if, on the application of the River Tweed council, he makes an order changing the annual close time on that river. That is a necessary consequential amendment, so that there shall be no inconsistency between the Act and the annual close time order.

I hope that my hon. Friends and others who took part in the interesting debate on the matter in Committee will welcome the decision that I have made to table the new clause.

Mr. Home Robertson: I doubt whether anglers with exotic tackle are a significant factor in the overfishing of salmon, but as the Bill provides so much scope for restricting other types of fishing, it is right that we should have the provision to regulate certain types of angling tackle at specified times. That is what the Minister is suggesting. It is fair enough that the district boards should be able to seek such regulations.

My only concern is that the device could be used for another form of discrimination against people whose faces are not thought to fit on Scotland's salmon angling beats. For example, when my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) next goes fishing in Scotland I trust that he will not run into any legal arguments with bailiffs about the nature of his fishing tackle just because he comes from Bannockburn while people from Tokyo, Chicago or even Woking are allowed to carry on fishing with the same sort of equipment.

If anyone doubts that such discrimination is possible, he need look no further than the Glasgow Herald of the ninth of this month. The Duke of Argyll was accused of indulging in some sort of illegal fishing operation, although admittedly it was with nets rather than angling gear. It was duly reported to the police, who sent a report to the procurator fiscal. According to the Glasgow Herald, the procurator fiscal said:

"I sent the report to the Crown Office . . . My approach is anything involving people in the hierarchy, as you might say, I send off to Edinburgh."

I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West would be counted as a member of the hierarchy, but I suspect that if it was him there would be no question of the procurator fiscal seeking guidance from the Lord Advocate. My hon. friend would probably find himself in the dock at Dunoon sheriff court pretty damn quick. But, seriously, providing the regulations in the new clause are enforced fairly, we shall be prepared to support it.

Sir Hector Monro: I thank the Minister for fulfilling the commitment that he gave in Committee that he would look at the matter favourably. I know that the district boards and the Salmon and Trout Association will be pleased that he has implemented it through the new clause. I am grateful to him.

Mr. Beith: I support the new clause. It is consistent with the principle that conservation should be the overriding objective, and that all sections and types of fishery should have conservation measures placed on them if a need can be shown. As the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) said, several other sectors of fishery are having extensive requirements placed upon them, and anglers must take their share, too. It is in everyone's interest that conservation should be carried out.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 3

SCOTTISH ANGLERS' TRUST

'(1) There shall be established a co-operative of anglers to be called The Scottish Anglers' Trust to administer and improve those angling waters under their control and to develop the sport of angling in Scotland.

(2) Membership of the Trust shall be open to all on payment of a subscription.

(3) Waters admininstered by the Trust may include those of public bodies leased at nominal rents to the Trust and those of proprietors willing to admit the public on condition that they are relieved of responsibility of organisation.

(4) The Trust shall be entitled to representation on District Salmon Fishery Boards in those areas in which angling waters are administered by the Trust.

(5) The Trust shall have the power to apply to the Secretary of State for an Access Order under the terms of subsection (5) below.

(6) The Secretary of State may, if satisfied that there is a demand for salmon angling in an area which cannot be met other than by the use of compulsory powers, make an Access Order. The Order shall specify: (a) the waters to which it applies, (b) the number of persons to be admitted at any one time, (c) the payment to be made to the proprietor, (d) the method of administration, (e) the season, (f) methods of fishing and (g) the routes and means of approach to be used.'.
—[Mr. Home Robertson.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

7.15 pm

Mr. Home Robertson: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause would provide for the establishment of a national anglers' co-operative trust in Scotland, with power to acquire, administer and improve salmon and trout fisheries for the benefit of all its members. Membership would be open to everybody on the payment of a subscription. The new clause also provides for powers to establish public access to salmon and trout fisheries where it is the only satisfactory way of providing fishing rights for the public.

A new clause such as this is necessary because in many areas of Scotland salmon fishing is virtually exclusively retained for the benefit of those who own fisheries or can afford to pay high prices for a day's fishing. The Bill goes to enormous lengths to protect and extend the rights and privileges of proprietors of salmon fisheries. That has been our main criticism, as my right hon. Friend the Minister well knows. The new clause seeks to achieve at least some balance by establishing a body to promote public access to fishing and to represent wider interests on the district salmon fishery boards.

I stress that we acknowledge and recognise the excellent work done by local angling clubs and associations in many parts of Scotland. However, it has to be said that salmon fishing remains an exclusive and expensive preserve for very rich people in many areas not covered by such an angling association. That is why we believe that it is necessary to take action to establish a Scottish anglers' trust.

It is not only the Labour party that is concerned about this aspect of salmon fishing, because back in 1962 the then Conservative Secretary of State for Scotland, Mr. John Maclay, who might be remembered by some hon. Members present, set up a committee to report on Scottish salmon and trout fisheries. The committee was chaired by my eminent constituent Lord Hunter. Its second report, published in May 1965, made several recommendations. I shall not go into detail, but I commend to the House and the Government paragraphs 108 to 126. The report specifically recommended the establishment of a Scottish anglers' trust and a system of access orders to provide public access to fisheries.

The Bill could have been a golden opportunity to combine better protection and conservation of salmon stocks with fairer administration of fishing rights and better public access to enjoy that part of Scotland's natural heritage, but inevitably the Government and their backwoodsmen in the other place have chosen instead to reinforce proprietorial privileges and to do little else. That is one of the reasons why we fear that the Bill will fail to conserve salmon. It discriminates blatantly in favour of certain vested interests. It has to be said that inherently contemptible laws tend to be treated with contempt.

New clause 3 would go some way towards restoring the balance and promoting public interest in conservation and angling. I commend it to the House.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I understand the thrust of the new clause and have considerable sympathy with it. If the Bill and the consequences that flow from it ensure that there are more fish in Scottish rivers, we should then take measures to ensure that there are more fishermen to take advantage of the fishing. In view of my constituency interests and the wider interests of angling in Scotland, I feel that what we should be looking for in the long run is an expansion of leisure fishing in Scottish rivers, with the increased numbers involved, because the economic benefits that would flow from that would be fairly substantial and widely spread.

The benefits that accrue to my constituency from salmon fishing stem from the number of people who come there when the fishing is good, and who spend money in the local economy, in the hotels and pubs and on the services in the area. I should like to see more people doing that. To the extent that a measure such as the new clause would achieve that, I would support it. However, I believe that if the Labour party had really wanted to press the matter and table a new clause that could carry widespread support, it would not have gone as far as it has with the powers that it proposes to establish.

The Government will not accept the new clause under any circumstances. If such a clause had been passed by a

[Mr. Malcolm Bruce]

Labour Government, a Conservative Secretary of State would seek not to implement any of the powers in it. It would be preferable to establish a trust which was likely to work outside the ambit of day-to-day party politics, and which went hand in hand with a policy of ensuring the maximum number of fish in Scottish rivers and giving the maximum number of people the opportunity to catch those fish, thus increasing the activities of the salmon fishing industry in Scotland.

That ought to be the spirit behind the Bill and our desire that it should be passed. Regretiably, however, as the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) said, the Bill is deficient in a number of ways, but that is not the point to highlight. I am not convinced that the Bill will achieve effective conservation.

I have considerable sympathy with the new clause. I support the establishment of a Scottish anglers' trust. However, the powers that the Labour party seeks would result in a move too quickly and too far in the other direction. Therefore, I am unable to support the clause as it stands. The establishment of such a trust is, however, desirable.

Sir Hector Monro: The only good point about the new clause is that the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) moved it briefly. He did not have the courage to say that it would result in the nationalisation of Scottish rivers, nor did he bother to say where all the money would come from to buy out Scottish riparian owners. He did not bother, either, to give sufficient credit to the very large number of angling associations and private owners who let fishing rights at very moderate rates throughout Scotland. The hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) knows that when he came to fish in Dumfriesshire he was able to fish for salmon for £5 a day. That is a modest fee.

Although all hon. Members want as many anglers as possible to be able to fish, what is needed is more conservation so that more fish become available for fishing. I should prefer that, rather than the purchase of privately owned water to be made available for public use. Opportunities are provided for those who want to fish. I hope that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland will resist the new clause. It is unnecessary.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): One would have hoped, although I admit that it was a forlorn hope, that when the Government decided to introduce the Salmon Bill it would have led to the conservation of salmon and to more public access. Unfortunately, the main thrust of the Bill is to set proprietorial rights in concrete instead of increasing public access.

Fishing rights in Scotland are confined to a very small minority. I challenge the basis of the salmon fishing legislation. It is wrong that rivers which have been in existence for countless thousands of years, and the fish in those rivers, should be the property, by virtue of legislation, of a tiny minority of wealthy people. I support the clause unreservedly. It would be a start if the public were able to have more access to angling waters. Then they would develop an interest in the conservation of salmon stocks.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I too, support the new clause unreservedly. I am fairly certain that those who support it do not envisage that anglers will be standing shoulder to shoulder along the river banks of Scotland. However, access must be widened. I am certain that the angling clubs in my constituency would welcome wider access.

In some instances the return of the salmon has been very largely due to the fine work of public bodies I mention as an example the River Clyde Purification Board. Salmon are again to be seen in the Clyde. The heart of this clause is access to this very fine sport. It should not be confined to a small group of very rich people, as is the case in many instances.

Mr. Canavan: I support the new clause wholeheartedly. I tried to introduce a similar clause in Committee. Unfortunately, on account of its lack of wisdom, the Committee did not accept it. This is a very moderate clause.

At least twice I have tried to introduce a private Member's Bill on the Floor of the House. Its purpose was to establish a democratically constituted Scottish anglers' trust. I point out to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) that the opposition to my Bill at First Reading was led not by the Tories, from whom one would expect opposition, but by the leader of the once great Liberal party, because of his vested constituency interest. Therefore, we saw what at one time was national Liberalism being reduced to narrow-minded parochialism.

Therefore it is hard to swallow what the hon. Member for Gordon said about his party having considerable sympathy for this new clause. It may be that in his heart of hearts the hon. Member for Gordon has considerable sympathy for the new clause, but on this issue he has been nobbled by his party leader, in the same way as other members of his party have been nobbled on defence by their leader. However, I shall not dwell on that matter. I know that they are very embarrassed about it and I do not like to see people being embarrassed.

I should like a far more radical measure to be introduced that would extend the ownership of fishing rights in Scotland. The new clause would help towards that end, but it is no secret that I should prefer there to be complete public ownership of all the freshwater fishing rights in Scotland. It is unfair for the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) to claim that this new clause would bring that about. My private Member's Bill would have achieved that aim, although it would have resulted in a decentralised form of public ownership rather than in nationalisation.

The ownership of fishing rights in Scotland is very much connected with the history of land tenure in Scotland. The owner of fishing rights is frequently the riparian landowner. That applies in particular to very lucrative fishing rights. We should try to democratise Scotland's most popular sport. The Scottish Sports Council says that over 500,000 people participate in freshwater fishing. Football is thought to be tremendously popular. Last night there were about 50,000 people at Parkhead for the European cup tie, but over 500,000 people participate in freshwater fishing. Because it is such a tremendously popular sport there is understandable concern among the participants, particularly among those on low incomes, that they do not enjoy a reasonable degree of access. The new clause would improve access and bring about a gradual widening of ownership.

The hon. Member for Dumfries referred to compensation. If a genuine request for compensation were made by those who had invested in fisheries and in restocking and conservation, I believe that clubs would be more interested in preferential terms of access rather than in financial compensation. I am sure that a measure such as this could be introduced for next to nothing in terms of financial compensation. If a group of people in an angling club put a great deal of work and investment into a particular stretch of water, surely a deal could be struck between the Scottish anglers' trust and the local angling club whereby the club received a certain number of rods per year on the river. Presumably, there would be an overall limit on the number of rods. With the Scottish anglers' trust, there would be an opportunity for democratic participation in the rules for the distribution of rods, access, permitted tackle, permitted times, prices, and so on.

There is no doubt that, in many cases, people who claim compensation have no moral title to do so. Whatever legal title they have, they certainly have no moral title to compensation. Their title to fishing rights is very much tied up with their land ownership rights. That is based on the hereditary principle. When I first introduced my Bill to establish a Scottish anglers' trust, I read out the names of those who were involved in applying for a special protection order in the Tweed catchment area. It read almost like a House of Lords Division list. Almost all were hereditary peers.

The names included the Marquis of Lothian, whose boy is in the Scottish Office; the Duke of Roxburghe; the Duke of Sutherland; and Lord Home of the Hirsel, who I believe before he died in a previous incarnation was called the 14th Earl of Hume. He got his land and fishing rights from the 13th Earl of Hume. The 13th Earl of Hume got them from the 12th Earl. The 12th Earl got them from the 11th Earl, and so on. The first Earl of Hume stole them from the people. Hon. Members who do not accept my version of history in terms of stealing land and fishing rights from the people might say that the land was gallantly fought for.

I remember the story of a man who was caught by the local landlord allegedly for poaching. The landlord said, "Get off my land". The poacher replied, "Who said that it's your land?" The landlord said, "I'll tell you this, my boy, my ancestors fought for this land. That is how it is my land." The poacher replied, "Get your bloody jacket off now and I'll fight you for it." That is the morality of land tenure in Scotland. Hon. Members laugh, but it goes back to the battle of Bannockburn. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton) laughs because it is true, and he appreciates my saying it. Going back to the battle of Bannockburn, the land was fought for. Some people changed sides at half time because they found they were in danger of being on the losing side. They changed their jerseys at half time just to ensure that they were on the winning side to get the land, fishing rights, and so on.

It is about time that the balance was restored, and that we returned land and fishing rights to the people. I do not expect all hon. Members to agree with my radical ideas. The new clause does fall short of my ideas, but it is a good measure. It is interesting to note that even people such as Lord Hunter, who is not a great friend of mine, have come out with similar proposals. I hope that the Minister and the House will sympathetically consider accepting the new clause.

Mr. John MacKay: We have had this debate on a number of occasions. During the first half of the speech by the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) I thought that he had lost the tape of his usual speech. However, during the second half he was back on stream. I wondered when the list of the people who came forward with the Tweed order would come before the House. The hon. Gentleman is well known for his devotion to a Scottish anglers' trust. As he rightly told us, he sought leave of the House to introduce a Bill in 1979 with the intention that the trust would be eligible for Government funding. Leave was refused on that occasion. He tried again in 1984, and he was no more successful.

On both occasions, as he said, he was opposed by the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel). A few moments ago, the hon. Member for Falkirk, West rebuked the right hon. Gentleman for looking after the interests of his constituents. I did not know that looking after constituents' interests was a vested interest. My constituents, like those in the borders constituency, did not want the anglers' trust that the hon. Gentleman was seeking. He wanted it because some of his constituents want to fish on the highways and byways of Scotland. They want to go where they like and fish by whatever method they like. That has caused great problems in the Tweed valley, the Tay valley and in many other parts of Scotland, including my own.

On both occasions the trust would have been concerned with freshwater fish — brown trout, grayling, and the like, but not salmon. The trust which he proposed in Committee would have had power over salmon in fresh water but not in salt water. It would have had no power over brown trout and other freshwater fish. The trust as proposed in the new clause would have power over salmon angling in Scotland in fresh or in salt water.

The principal argument is always that people cannot get salmon fishing, yet the hon. Gentleman told us that over half a million people fish in Scotland. I know that some people fish only for brown trout. However, many fish for both. Of course, there are some extremely expensive beats. I recall that a sporting event took place in Mexico at the time of the Committee stage. I pointed out to the hon. Gentleman then, and I do so again, that £1,000 a week for more than one rod, perhaps eight or 10 rods, to fish on some of the expensive beats does not compare unfavourably with the £1,000 it would have cost a person to follow Scotland to Mexico to see the World Cup matches. One pays at the top range for one's sport if one wants to play at that level. If a person wants to pay a rather more modest price, as most of us do, he can find places all over Scotland where he can pay a modest price to get at some fairly good salmon fishing aside from members of angling clubs who can have access to some good water through that angling club.

In Committee, I said—Opposition Members will not be surprised to hear it again — that the Government could not accept what is essentially a doctrinaire proposition. It infringes unfairly on the rights of those who own salmon fishing rights in Scotland. Nothing that I have heard tonight makes me wish to change my mind. I do not want to go through the clauses in detail. However, new clause 3(5) states:

[Mr. John MacKay]

"The Trust shall have the power to apply to the Secretary of State for an Access Order".

That is not a democratic arrangement. There is no provision for appeals or for public and local inquiries. There is no consideration of the proprietor's position. Effectively, the Secretary of State is asked to exercise compulsory powers over land for the benefit of the anglers' trust or its members without any of the normal safeguards of individual rights.

I shall not continue. I do not suppose that the House is surprised by the line I take. Apart from a few people who wish to fish where and when they like, and by what means they like, I do not believe that there is any great demand in Scotland, outside the doctrinaire ranks of some parts of the Labour party, for such a body. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw his new clause. If he does not do so, I am quite sure that most hon. Members will agree with me.

Question put and negatived.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON SALMON CONSERVATION

(1) The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and Secretaries of State acting jointly shall within three months of this Act coming into force, establish an advisory committee to consider such matters relating to the conservation of salmon as the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Secretaries of State or any of them shall from time to time refer to it.

(3) Without prejudice to the provisions of subsections (1) and (2) above, it shall be the duty of the advisory committee to consider in the aforementioned first report whether the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and Secretaries of State or any of them should be conferred with powers which would enable a scheme or schemes to be introduced for the better regulation of salmon fisheries including the more effective collection of catch statistics.

(4) The advisory committee may appoint sub committees for England, Wales and Scotland to report upon such matters and at such times as it considers appropriate.'. — [Mr. Randall.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Randall: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following: New clause 5 — Measures for conservation of salmon—

(b) any person who imports a salmon into any area which is subject to an order made under this section, other than for the purpose of dealing in salmon or otherwise gaining from its disposal.

(3) Without prejudice to the provisions of paragraph (b) of subsection (2)(i) above, an order under this section may—

(i) make different provision for different cases; and

(ii) contain such incidental, supplemental and transitional provision as appears to the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Secretaries of State, or any of them, to be necessary or expedient.

(4) No order shall be made under the section unless a draft of the order has been laid before, and approved by a resolution of each house of parliament.

(5) In this section "responsible authority" means, in relation to England and Wales, the relevant water authority and, in relation to Scotland, the relevant district salmon fishery board.'.

New clause 6 — Measures for the better regulation of salmon fisheries—

'(1) The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Secretaries of State or any of them, may, for the better regulation of salmon fisheries in accordance with the provisions of subsection (3) of section (Advisory committee on salmon conservation), by order made by statutory instrument make provision for a scheme or schemes which will facilitate the more effective collection of catch statistics by providing for the tagging of all salmon lawfully taken within England and Wales or Scotland.

(3) Without prejudice to the provisions of paragraph (b) of subsection (2) above, an order under this section may—

(i) make different provision for different cases; and

(ii) contain such incidental, supplemental and transitional provision as appears to the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Secretaries of State, or any of them, to be necessary or expedient.

(4) A statutory instrument containing an order under this section shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.'.

Amendment (a) to new clause 6, leave out subsection (4), and insert—

'(4) No order shall be made under this section unless a draft of the order has been laid before, and approved by a resolution of, each House of Parliament.'.

New clause 9 — Moratorium on net fishing in River Tay—

(1) The Secretary of State for Scotland shall lay before Parliament, before 31st December 1986, an order for a moratorium on all net fishing for salmon in the River Tay and its tributaries.

(2) The order for a moratorium and any order to amend or end the moratorium shall require the approval of the House of Commons by affirmative resolution.'.

Mr. Randall: New clause 4 deals with the establishment of a statutory advisory committee on conservation, new clause 5 provides enabling powers for the Minister to introduce conservation regulations and new clause 6 deals with the more effective collection of catch statistics.

In June we were delighted when the Minister of State came to the Standing Committee and announced as a concession to the Opposition that he intended to establish an advisory committee.

Mr. Onslow: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Randall: I shall not give way immediately, because I have only just begun.

The purpose of the advisory committee is to collect more accurate information and to establish effective fishery management regimes. I was pleased when the Minister made that announcement, and I have read Hansard carefully to see what he said.

Some hon. Members were genuinely concerned about the slant of the Bill. We had been working on it for some weeks and we did not seem to be addressing fully—at least certainly not to my satisfaction or to that of hon. Members on both sides—the issue of conservation. We were spending most of our time debating who would be represented on the boards and the fight between netsmen and rod-and-line men — I see Conservative Members nodding—and we were greatly worried. I was delighted when the Minister attended the Committee—because he obviously recognised that the Bill was in trouble—and announced the establishment of the advisory committee. Essentially, we have bolted on to the Bill the advisory committee, which will deal with conservation, among other matters.

Mr. Gummer: I have checked this matter carefully, and I want the House to be fully aware of the discussions in Committee. I announced the proposal for an advisory committee in response to the cogent arguments put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) and other right hon. and hon. Friends. I want to make that point because it would be churlish of the hon. Gentleman to claim parentage for this committee. Obviously he wishes to extend its arrangements, but to claim parentage when it lies with my hon. Friend would be a pity.

Mr. Randall: To judge from the representations that I received, I thought that the Minister had been listening to people with fishing interests. I have talked to some of them and I thought that it was that pressure, as well as other pressure, that had led to the committee. However, I do not wish to suggest that the hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) did not play a significant role. The Opposition take the committee extremely seriously. We certainly do not regard it as an expedient which got the Minister off the hook when the Bill was in such a mess.

It is interesting to see on the Amendment Paper the number of Welsh Members, as well as English and Scottish Members, who support the new clause. It shows the seriousness with which Welsh Members take the question of fishing in Wales, which is good. I would go so far as to say that the Welsh economy relies heavily on fishing. Indeed, it is so important that the Minister's credibility is at stake over the operation of his new advisory committee. We expect him to deliver on this.

Because of the importance of salmon fishing in Wales, I have received representations about the duration of the advisory committee. It has since been suggested to me that the Minister said that it would last for three years. I have read Hansard, and I cannot find that. Will the Minister tell us whether that will be the case? I would prefer him to be open minded about the matter, and if the committee serves a useful function to consider that, rather than have a fixed time scale for it.

New clause 5 refers to tagging for regulation purposes. In a transaction, salmon would have to have to be tagged or labelled. There would be exceptions, but that would be the general thrust. The major short-term interest for Wales is to develop a more effective system for creating catch statistics. Scottish fishing is in such poor shape that it is crucial to proceed with effective conservation action as soon as possible. Is the Minister sympathetic to using tagging techniques purely for developing statistics? Will he encourage the advisory committee to give fair and due consideration to that matter? Tagging is important both for statistics and as a useful pilot scheme, so that if at a later date the committee so decides we can use tagging for licensing and regulation schemes.

Mr. Onslow: I am interested in what the hon. Gentleman is saying. He seems to be making a case for statistics. What is wrong with the present method of collecting statistics in Wales?

Mr. Randall: I can answer that simply. In Committee, as many hon. Members mentioned, we received information that people were generating statistics and cases to serve their own ends and interests. The Minister spoke at length about that, and I agreed with what he said. We need an unbiased source of information about migration patterns, what fish are where, and so on. In Committee I could not feel confident about the information that we were receiving or whether we were making the right judgments. Will the Minister keep an open mind about the use of tagging for catch statistics as a pilot scheme?

In Committee various hon. Members said that tagging was not popular in Scotland. I have received information that the main reason why many Scottish fishermen are worried about tagging is that they are afraid that the cost will be added to the licence fee. I do not know whether the Minister has also picked up that information.

From the beginning, the advisory committee should have been the core of our measures to improve conservation. It is the most important matter that we shall discuss tonight. I want the committee to be durable. I do not want the Minister to disband it for various reasons. I certainly want it to be effective. Will the Minister tell the House whether he feels that he has all the necessary powers to implement all the possible future recommendations of the committee? If that is not so, it could constrain the committee. For those two reasons — durability and effectiveness — I should like this to be a statutory advisory committee. My hon. Friends and I feel so strongly about this that, unless the Minister gives some concessions tonight, we shall seek to divide the House.

Concern has been expressed about the representations on the committee. I hope that the Minister takes this as seriously as we do. We hope that the chairman will be truly independent, and that the committee will represent a broad and appropriate range of interests, especially relating to Wales. I hope that the representation from Wales will comprise people with experience of fishery management, and not just fishermen. My hon. Friends and I will be most interested to hear the Minister's views on overall representation on the committee.

New clause 6 is a fallback clause for the better regulation of salmon fisheries by using tagging to produce better catch statistics. The reason for tagging is simply to conserve fish. Fishermen in Wales believe that tagging can, and will, work if given the chance. It is important that the Minister has an open mind on this, and I shall be interested to hear what he has to say in response to the various issues that I have raised.

Sir Hector Monro: I welcome the comments by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) about the advisory committee. This concept was introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow).

I agree that the new clause concentrates on conservation. The Government have taken two steps in this direction—first, by setting up the standing advisory committee. I hope that it will begin work soon, report continuously and not keep the House waiting. There is also the Government review which will report within three years on east coast drift netting. Both are important steps. However, the Bill has insufficient provisions for conservation and the future of salmon.

I am sure that the Minister knows that today the International Atlantic Salmon Symposium has been meeting in Biarritz. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Minister has a representative there who will be taking a note of what is said. I understand from the director of the Atlantic Salmon Trust that an important conservation resolution was passed today. I must admit that neither my shorthand nor the telephone line were particularly good, but it stated:

"In view of the greater increase in and potential of salmon angling, and its appreciable smaller harvest, each national Government of salmon-producing countries is urged to declare a salmon policy which will institute conservation measures within its area of jurisdiction, a management programme to reduce commercial harvesting of salmon with a view to increasing stocks, and improving recreational salmon catches."

I hope that the Government will take some action to implement this resolution at the earliest opportunity. I would be grateful for the Minister's views on this, and on the International Salmon Symposium.

Dr. Godman: I am grateful that the hon. Gentleman apologised for his shorthand. May I ask him if the resolution contained a last paragraph relating to payment of compensation to those in the commercial salmon fisheries who would lose their livelihoods if Governments were to adopt the resolution?

Sir Hector Monro: No, there was no such paragraph. The resolution ended with the remarks about improving recreational salmon catching. It is still early days; let us get the principles right, and then we can deal with the details.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): Surely my hon. Friend would not object to compensation in principle.

Sir Hector Monro: My hon. Friend knows that we dealt with such proposals on an amendment in Committee when I expressed the wish to phase out—I emphasise that it must be phasing out—drift netting on the north-east coast. Of course, compensation would have to be paid because we would be removing their livelihoods from a substantial number of people who fish in those waters.

Conservation is at the heart of the Bill and in this we have been supported throughout by the chairman of the Salmon and Trout Association, the Scottish Landowners Federation and the district boards. We all want to see more fish in the rivers so that we can increase the stocks. I have been disappointed that the Bill does not go very far, especially in relation to drift netting off the north-east coast. We do, of course, appreciate that there would be an impact on jobs, but Scotland faced that problem some years ago and survived the difficulties.

New regulations will reduce the pressure on drift netting off the north-east coast. People are beginning to understand the balance between the numbers who fish off the north-east coast as compared with those people in the United Kingdom as a whole who benefit in one way or another from salmon fishing. As the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) has said, the tourist industry, the hotel industry and the many people who support salmon fishing would all be affected.

We must consider one statistic especially. Between 1950 and 1959 catches of salmon and grilse off the north-east coast averaged 2,000 per year; from 1970 to 1979 that figure was 48,140; between 1980 and 1984 it was 60,330; and in 1985 it was 77,000. The rivers cannot stand this dramatic increase, which is why our stocks and catches are falling. I warmly support the article in The Times yesterday by Lord Moran, who has done much in another place to increase the conservation provisions in the Bill.

Mr. Tinn: The hon. Gentleman seems to be quoting selectively from statistics. Figures supplied to me by the Northumbrian water authority show that during these periods there have been normal cyclical variations in catches. For instance, in 1976 the salmon catch was only 4,500, the year before it was 21,000 and a year later it was 14,000. In other words, it is an up and down story. It was meaningless of the hon. Gentleman to talk about averages.

Sir Hector Monro: I disagree. I was dealing with averages over a period of 10 years which I think allows for ups and downs in the cyclical life of the salmon. Anyone involved in fishing knows that. It is important to realise the dramatic increases that have occurred in salmon catches, probably as a result of the modernisation of gear and of monofilament nets, none of which existed in the early days of the fisheries.

Whatever action the Government have taken already, they will have to go a great deal further before we shall be able to see an enhancement of stock in the rivers of the United Kingdom. If we do not set our own house in order, how on earth can we expect those interested in fisheries in the Faroes, in Greenland or even off the coast of Ireland to take any action? We must take some action because at present we are falling very flat on our faces. The advisory committee must take the strongest possible measures in recommending to the Government the appropriate course of action.

I hope that when my right hon. Friend the Minister replies to the debate he will give us an emphatic assurance that he will listen to what the advisory committee says and then take action. We do not want a ghost-like committee making reports that are shelved and nothing happening. We have not got anywhere near solving the issue of conserving a remarkably important resource. If we do not take much stronger steps than we have taken so far, the future of rod salmon fishing in Scotland in particular, and, indeed, the fixed nets around our coasts, will be seriously curtailed. The time for action is not too soon.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): As my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) said, many Welsh Members have signed the new clauses, some of whom, like my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies), will not speak, although I think that I can speak for him and certainly for a number of others. I also speak as the president of the Welsh Anglers Council, a body which covers coarse, game and sea fishing. It is remarkable that it should have got all those anglers together to work in one direction, but it has been doing so and they are unanimous on the principles and ideas behind the three new clauses.

The Welsh scene is the only one that I can really speak about. It is worth reiterating, at least to make sure that the public conception of these matters is right, that large-scale illegal fishing in Welsh rivers is no longer the story of the romantic poacher catching one for the pot; it is big business and highly commercialised. It involves refrigerated vans near the bank and considerable battles on the banks between our bailiffs and those unscrupulous people who will take violent action to ensure that they get their illegal catch.

Another feature of the Welsh scene, different from the Scottish scene, is that Welsh angling is extremely popular. It is not exclusive. The sport is run primarily by responsible angling clubs and the charges and fees are not expensive. The petition that I presented to the House last night contained 18,600 signatures of people supporting the principles of these three new clauses and was promoted and brought by popular angling clubs such as Llandysul, Tawe and Tributaries and Tregaron — all genuinely representative of the communities and the people who enjoy the sport of fishing.

That is why in the three new clauses we seek, first, to inject a sense of urgency into the process. As the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) said, time is not on the side of the salmon or on the side of conservation. The decline is serious, and we have not been able to chart it effectively. The Welsh water authority, a strong supporter of these proposals, was surprised and shocked by the decline shown by the 1982 inquiry which it could not anticipate. It realises that a severe decline has taken place and that it has not been properly discovered and charted.

In new clause 4 we say that the establishment of the advisory committee cannot be a genteel leisurely affair. Therefore, as we say, we hope that it will be set up within three months, if not sooner. Obviously one issue will be the personnel. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, West, and he is reflecting the views of the Welsh angling fraternity, that we do not want fishermen to give and support the professional advice that we think will be necessary.

The Minister should take powers to introduce a scheme for tagging. That has caused division within the Committee and even among friends who, on a cross-party basis, have worked hard to implement conservation measures. In new clause 5 we are asking only that the Minister takes the power. Obviously, we would like him to implement a tagging scheme, but new clause 5 only requires the Minister to take power now so that if the advisory committee finds and convinces him that a tagging scheme is an essential part of the conservation of salmon stock it can be introduced without the need to come to the House for a full-scale new Bill.

Let us be realistic. We have vast experience of such legislation. I have had 20 years and other hon. Members have had even longer. We know that to get a Bill into the annual timetable and to bring a measure before the House through the Cabinet sub-committees and so on is not an easy task. Therefore, even with an early realisation that tagging was an integral and intrinsic part of conservation, we fear that two, three or four years would slip by before legislation could be enacted to give the Minister power to introduce such a scheme. All that we are asking for in new clause 5 is that the Minister should take the necessary power.

Within the Principality there is unanimity. The Welsh are not notorious for unanimity. Indeed, the reverse is the case. We can usually divide happily and easily amongst ourselves. But there is a consensus bordering on unanimity among all the interested parties and groups that tagging could be introduced, at least in the Principality. With the popular support that there is for such a scheme, we could run a pilot scheme within the Principality.

The hon. Member for Dumfries mentioned the important conclusions and considerations of the symposium at Biarritz. Another major announcement that has come out of that symposium is an announcement by the French representative that the French intend to introduce a full-scale nationwide tagging system next year. I have the details of the outline here. Tagging has now been seen as a national solution to the problem of conservation by the French, not just the Welsh or a small group of interested and fanatical fishermen. Mr. Claude Batault, special adviser to the Minister at the conference, has announced that the French will introduce a nationwide tagging system to cover both rod and line, commercial fishing, commercial fishing at sea and imports. The French do not think, as I think the Minister argued in Committee, that that contradicts GATT. The reasons given at the symposium for the French introducing tagging were conservation and better catch statistics. That double purpose is contained in new clause 5 and in our fallback position in new clause 6.

Mr. Onslow: It is fair to remind the House that there are fewer salmon in French rivers than in Welsh rivers and that the French proposal to limit any one rod angler for salmon to a total catch of four in a year might be inadequate in Wales.

Mr. Rowlands: The details of the introduction of a nationwide scheme would be for the advisory committee to advise on. That is the purpose of new clause 4. It seeks to make sure that the advisory committee makes salmon tagging an urgent priority and considers the proper means of implementing it. But here is one nation which, fearing the threat to its salmon stock, is to introduce a nationwide scheme. Therefore, it is not just a sectional interest of fanatical Welsh anglers which is promoting this concept; there is a great deal of support for it.

The Principality supports the principle of tagging. Tagging will complement the licence dealing system, not duplicate or contradict it. They go together. Together they could be an effective system of conserving and collecting statistics which we in Wales feel are woefully inadequate. I hope that the Minister will not turn his back on the petition signed by more than 18,500 anglers and supporters of angling right across the country who support the proposals in the three new clauses that we have brought to the House tonight.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): We all support the cause of conservation, but the new clauses are deficient because no mention is made of the damage done to salmon stocks by seals. Salmon stocks will not be adequately protected until we grasp the nettle and deal with the sensitive question of the need for a much greater culling of seals. They are destroying North sea fish stocks, including salmon, at a frightening rate.

According to a recent estimate, there are 84,000 seals in the North sea, taking approximately 50,000 tonnes of fish a year. I have been told by fixed-net salmon fishermen who fish off the beach at Bridlington that often up to one in four of the salmon that they catch are not saleable because they are dead or because they are maimed after being bitten by seals. Unfortunately those animals, which look so attractive and receive so much sympathy when they are culled, are very much like foxes. They do not just attack a salmon and eat it but are like a fox which kills all the chickens in a hen house rather than killing one and eating it. The seals take indiscriminate bites out of salmon, often leaving them alive and maimed, thus making them unsaleable.

I draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Minister to this problem, and express the hope that when he considers conservation measures he will support the demands of the Bridlington fishermen for a greater culling of seals.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): If the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) has made the strongest arguments he can against the new clauses, they must commend themselves strongly to the House. I associate myself with the comments that have been made by hon. Members on both sides of the House. They are particularly relevant to the Welsh salmon fishing problem. As the hon Member for Methyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) said, angling in Wales is a popular sport. It is the ordinary person's pastime and interest, and probably the greatest participatory sport in Wales.

I have had 200 letters about the Bill from anglers in my constituency. They were worried that it concentrated on the problems of Scotland. We appreciate that that is necessary, but the Bill does not address itself to the problems of fishing in Wales, and especially the conservation of salmon stocks in Wales.

Whatever the problems caused by the seals taking a part of the migration salmon stocks — obviously they take some—it is difficult to believe that they are taking any more than they took in centuries gone by. Yet historically in Wales salmon fishing has been a popular sport. Salmon have been available in Welsh rivers for centuries. Now, suddenly, in the past decade or two salmon have become scarce.

Mr. Townend: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman is not aware that the seal population in the North sea has quadrupled during the past 20 years. Naturally, if there are four times as many seals they are likely to take four times as many salmon.

Mr. Wigley: I was interested to hear of the seal tagging exercise that gave the hon. Gentleman such detailed information on the number of seals. I am taking a longer view. I am looking back over the centuries. There is no doubt that during the past couple of decades there has been a massive drop of salmon numbers in Welsh rivers which is not due just, or mainly, to seals. Obviously they play a part in the reduced salmon stocks, but it is not a major part.

Hon. Members who know the angling scene in Wales know what is happening. We know, as the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney said, that it is not the traditional poacher taking the odd salmon here and there. We have all lived with that as part of the social scene. Now there are large-scale operations. Poachers come with gelignite and blow up rivers. Other poachers come with poison, God help us. The rivers are poisoned and made barren for years.

8.15 pm

We know from court cases that people have come from Manchester and raided rivers such as the Dyfi and then received a sentence of a few months when they should have received a much severer sentence. The cumulative effect of their actions has been massive.

Representations have been made, especially to hon. Members who represent Welsh constituencies, by the Welsh Salmon and Trout Angling Association. In a letter, it said:

"The Welsh Salmon and Trout Angling Association wish to bring to the Government's notice that the angling community of Wales is deeply concerned that the conservation provisions contained within the existing Salmon Bill are totally inadequate as far as Wales is concerned. Since 1976 the Welsh Salmon and Trout Angling Association have campaigned vociferously for measures to be introduced to save the Welsh Salmon stocks. We as the governing body are concerned that in terms of conservation the present Bill does nothing to safeguard the run of migratory fish to their spawning beds and consequently to increase the spawning potential."

I know that many hon. Members on both sides of the House fish on our excellent rivers, such as the Conwy, the Dyfi and the others mentioned by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney.

I am glad to see the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding), as I know of her husband's great interest in this matter. I know his patience in that he could spend 10 or 11 hours in debate in the House or in Committee. He needs that patience to fish for salmon in rivers such as the Dyfi now. Ten or 20 years ago it would not have been surprising to talk of catching half a dozen or a dozen salmon. Now it is a matter of special interest and a topic of conversation if somebody has caught a salmon. People say, "Oh—you have actually caught a salmon." That is the change that has occurred. The Government must take this problem to heart.

There are two main requirements. We want to give the advisory committee teeth and to include on it people who fish in Wales. I mention Wales especially, because I know the problems there. The committee's job is ongoing and it must be given teeth to do it. There is also a need for tagging. Information is needed about the salmon if there is to be a scientific base on which to found further action to conserve the salmon stocks.

Such proposals are supported by anglers and those involved with the water authorities. The bailiffs often face a difficult task in trying to enforce regulations. All sections of the community in Wales support these proposals. It would be sad if the Government missed this opportunity. Indeed, if they miss this opportunity to rectify the situation, I am sure that the problem will be raised again in private Members' Bills.

This matter is very important to my constituents, and that is why I am here tonight rather than at my party's annual conference. I hope that the Government will seriously consider the new clauses and either accept them as they are, or give a firm commitment that they will move in their general direction.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): All of us have taken a close and active interest in the proceedings on the Bill. I welcome the Welsh voice which is in such strong and full throat tonight, and many of the comments that have been made. Indeed, I share the concern of the Welsh Members. The problem does not just concern Wales, although perhaps, judging by what we have heard tonight, the problem is even more serious there than in some Scottish rivers.

Having examined the culling system, I am not convinced that tagging in the United Kingdom would fulfil the objectives that have been ascribed to it as successfully as some of the hon. Members think. After all, the alternatives proposed by the Government go a long way towards meeting the fears of right hon. and hon. Members.

I refer, for example, to the dealer licensing system. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands), who introduced those Welsh anxieties, will bear in mind that when the Bill was introduced there was no question of a nationwide licensing system. It was limited purely to Scotland, and this was one of the big changes the Government made in their thinking. Those two measures are most helpful.

In Committee, Conservative and Opposition Members expressed concern about the need for further action. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland have taken a keen and assiduous interest in the Bill, and will be aware that it has its critics both in the House and outside. The Bill represents a great opportunity. As we all know, such opportunities do not come easily, and in the foreseeable future this is probably the last chance to legislate for salmon. That is why we have all stressed the need for more action than that proposed in the Bill. Perhaps that is the main reason why Opposition Members want a statutory advisory committee.

As we all know, if the British can fumble and fudge anything, they will do so by setting up a committee. The fear is that, if we set up a committee that is not statutory, that is just what will happen. The arguments that we adduce in favour of stronger action will be whittled away and drowned in the mumbling away of a committee that has no powers. Accordingly, if my right hon. Friend the Minister decides to go against those who want a statutory advisory committee, I hope that he will at least give us a strong assurance that this Bill will not be the end of the matter. There are strong grounds for believing that further action is needed, and we would expect that committee to be able to report with authority, and in a way that would morally bind the next Government to take action.

The new clauses mention statistics. It has been extraordinarily difficult to get hold of statistics to prove to doubters that we are facing a serious situation. Consequently, we are all very much indebted to the Salmon and Trout Association, which has taken up the cudgels on our behalf. In Committee the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland gave figures that have enabled analysts to relate netting jobs to specific rivers and areas of Scotland. The association asks us to recognise that its calculations are only approximate, and not accurate to the last decimal point. As a result, it believes that the number of netsmen involved is small, and at times as few as 520. At peak periods, the number rises to 1,177. Using the 1984 catch figures, and assuming a landed value of £2 per pound, the average earnings per man amount to just over £1,000 for net and coble fishermen. The figure is higher for fixed engine fishermen. The association points out that earnings fluctuate wildly between districts, and rise to more than £6,000 in the far north.

The association believes that in the north of Scotland some 70 netsmen take around 86 per cent. of the salmon catch, amounting to 46,000 fish. It argues that we should be much tougher in our attitude to those who fish by net in estuaries or who fish at sea using drift nets. I agree with that, and that is why the Bill falls short. We should increase the weekly close time for Scottish nets to 60 hours. However, that has been rejected by the Government.

The committee set up by the Government should look at the figures carefully and take action accordingly. The figures all suggest that salmon and sea trout have much more economic value as a sporting resource to the economies of Wales, England and Scotland than as a food. Moreover, some of us believe that we are approaching the point of no return in the damage being done to a great natural resource. The factor uniting fishermen and others is that we want to conserve the salmon. With those thoughts in mind, I shall listen with interest to what my right hon. Friend the Minister has to say.

Mr. Tinn: I should like to correct an impression that I may have given the House on Second Reading. I then mentioned Dr. Derek Mills of the department of forestry and natural resources at Edinburgh university, and, without having sufficiently checked my facts, I rather loosely referred to him as having changed his mind. I said that he had been a critic of the drift net fishermen of north-east England but that he had now exonerated them.

More in sorrow than in anger, Dr. Mills kindly wrote to me pointing out my error. It was wrong to say that he had exonerated them, although he and other fishery scientists had shown that the current low in salmon catches in Scotland and other salmon-producing nations was cyclical, occurring about every 25 years in the past 100 years. They believe that that can be attributed to oceanic conditions. However, Dr. Mills fairly said that that did not automatically mean that the north-east England drift net fishermen are exonerated. Perhaps I made that rather welcome assumption too easily. However, I have already apologised to Dr. Mills, and I am happy to correct the impression that I gave.

The drift net fishermen of the north-east of England are rather like Banquo's ghost, in that, although they are not mentioned in the Bill, they keep popping up, just as they did in Committee. The drift net fishing industry in the north-east of England is essentially small scale. It uses the traditional north-eastern coble, which is rather less than 30 ft. Only 182 vessels are involved. Far from being a free-for-all, it is the most tightly controlled fishery in Europe.

I have a few suggestions for the advisory council. For example, it should consider the policy pursued by the Northumbrian water authority. That authority and the drift net fishermen could already give some useful tips. For many years they have had a strict limit on licence numbers. The authority has formed conservation areas for salmon in areas and rivers where salmon tend to collect. In the north of the water authority's area, the length of drift nets at sea is restricted to 600 yd and to 400 yd in the Yorkshire area. The working week and the season are also limited. Moreover, the licensee can employ only those crew named on the licence.

The protection of stocks has been a central theme, and, in contrast to elsewhere, there has been a marked recovery in salmon stocks in Northumbrian rivers. It seems a little odd that the poor Scottish salmon cannot get up to the Tay, yet they are getting to the Tyne and the Tweed in increasing numbers. I assure hon. Members that our fishermen are not asking the nationality of the salmon and throwing them back if they are English.

I am sure that the advisory committee will be happy to look at the practices of the Northumbrian water authority, and the north-east coast fishermen will be happy to co-operate with the authority and in any conservation measures. However, conservation measures to save salmon must not mean the extinction of the drift net fishermen of the north-east coast.

8.30 pm

Mr. Charles Morrison (Devizes): In the light of what the hon. Member for Redcar (Mr. Tinn) said, the House should recall that it has been clearly established that 94 per cent. of the salmon and grilse taken in the North sea fishery are bound for Scottish rivers. No matter what statistics the hon. Gentleman provides about the nets, we must take account of that important aspect.

I agree strongly with my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) and others that the Bill does not do enough for conservation. However, I regard the Bill as no more than the end of the beginning of the creation of a better climate for conservation. It is no more than a start and, as time goes by, it will become clear that more measures will have to be taken.

One of the best indirect forms of conservation is that provided by the creation of, and the increase in, salmon farming. In the 12 months up to September this year, 11,000 boxes of Scottish wild salmon were sold at Billingsgate market, but during the same period 43,000 boxes of Scottish farmed salmon and 51,000 boxes of Norwegian farmed salmon were sold at the market. For some reason that I do not understand, boxes of wild salmon are slightly heavier than boxes of farmed salmon.

The comparison is remarkable and it emphasises a point made implicitly by my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) who said that salmon should be considered a sport resource. Because of the development of salmon farming, we no longer live in an age when wild salmon need to be regarded as a food source.

The need for an advisory committee is self-evident. It is clearly essential. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Minister of State on taking the advice of my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow)—

Mr. Randall: And others.

Mr. Morrison: My hon. Friend the Member for Woking, who tonight probably became the first chairman of the 1922 Committee to be described as the Opposition, was the originator of the proposal. He and, of course, others deserve credit for persuading the Minister to accept the idea. I believe that the advisory committee will play an increasingly important role and will perform not only the functions set out in new clause 4, but many others as well.

I am convinced that, as soon as the announcement of the establishment of the committee was made, it automatically became durable. Politically, no Minister would dare to abolish it; that would be a political impossibility. Therefore, I am not convinced that we should make the committee a statutory body. Indeed, if it is not a statutory committee it may retain more flexibility and perhaps could stray into areas that need looking at, but which it might not be able to examine if it were a statutory body.

I understand the desire of Opposition Members who wish to have a statutory committee, but it seems to me much more important that the committee should be established quickly and should act quickly. Even if the Minister cannot give us the names of the members who are to be appointed soon, I hope that he will tell us when the committee will start to operate. That would be a great reassurance to the House and, more important, to all those involved in salmon fishing.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): I wish to speak about Welsh interests. As a lifelong angler who belongs to a Welsh angling club, I support new clauses 4, 5 and 6 because they are vital for the conservation of salmon stocks.

We are at the 11th hour. Salmon are a disappearing asset and many fishermen do not catch even the four salmon per season to whch reference was made earlier. I challenge the hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) who said that the collection of statistics would not be improved by the tagging of salmon. The Welsh water authority is collecting statistics and supports the tagging of salmon. Indeed, it has on the stocks a programme for salmon tagging, because it believes that better statistics could be provided under such a scheme. That is a potent argument.

It is important that we do not make the advisory committee just another quango. Members must include people with knowledge and interest and members of local organisations who know what they are talking about and, in particular, know a lot about the management of fisheries.

It is important that a tagging scheme is introduced at the earliest moment after the establishment of the advisory committee. We have not a minute to waste in the conservation of Atlantic salmon.

I wish to put on record the input to the new clauses from the Welsh Salmon and Trout Angling Association, the Welsh water authority and many Welsh angling clubs. Mention has already been made of the 18,000 signatures on petitions in favour of tagging. It is important that any tagging scheme should include imported fish and farmed fish, though I recognise that that would create difficulties. However, I am closely associated with agriculture, where all stock is tagged as a matter of routine, and I do not believe that it should be too difficult to tag salmon, whether they are farmed or taken in the wild.

We are in the stone age in our recording of salmon. We know very little about the true catch. Tagging will enable us to know how many salmon are caught, and that will enable us to improve our fisheries.

Dr. Godman: The hon. Gentleman should not minimise the problems for fish farmers of tagging stocks. Many of the fish farms in Scotland and Shetland and in the islands are small businesses and tagging, however admirable a practice, would present formidable problems for such small businesses.

Mr. Livsey: I note the remarks by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman). I accept that there are some problems but they can be overcome. It should be possible to tag farm fish in the same way as it is possible to tag farm animals. Salmon have to be boxed before they are marketed and they can be tagged when they are being prepared for the market. I see nothing difficult in that. In response to my speech on Second Reading the Minister said that he would consider the possibility of a Welsh tagging scheme. I hope that he will accept that the views on this side of the House are strong. They are the views of Welsh fishing interests and of those who are actively engaged in angling in Wales. They consider this to be essential for the future of salmon fishing in Wales.

Mr. Onslow: You have been generous, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in allowing us to have what is virtually a Third Reading debate on these new clauses. That will save a lot of time and enable some Scottish Members to catch their trains. I shall make no apology if I keep one or two Scottish Members a little late. Indeed, some of the things that I propose to say may be of assistance to them.

The Minister told us that he would introduce an advisory committee. I think it really is rather impertinent for the Opposition Front Bench to try to claim parentage for that committee. They have no title to it. The committee is probably the most important thing to come out of our Standing Committee deliberations. I hope that the Minister will tell us a number of things that will give encouragement to those hon. Members who have taken a close interest in these matters for a long time. That does not include the Opposition Front Bench.

The need to make progress is perceived all the more when one considers that we have had to take this Bill in the spillover session. We might have started to deal with a number of matters at the end of the summer if we had been able to complete consideration of the Bill then, and it is a matter of regret to many people that we were not able to do that. However, such things happen. I hope that the eagerness of the Scottish Minister responsible for these matters will not be frustrated by our delays. I hope that the period of thought that my right hon. Friend the Minister enjoyed during the long recess will have enabled him to formulate some fairly clear ideas about what the committee will do and that he will tell the House about them tonight. He may not be able to tell us the precise membership, but I hope that he will be able to tell us the names of the people whom he has invited to serve and the names of those who have agreed. He would do the House a service by telling us what he foresees as the composition of this committee.

Although most of the debate has been about Wales, it must be admitted that there are far more salmon in Scottish rivers than there are in English and Welsh rivers, more is the pity. It would therefore be wrong to deny the Scots a proportionate share of representation on the committee. Of course we do not want on the committee people who are landed proprietors and who take no interest in their fisheries—[Interruption.]—such as the hon. Gentleman who has just made a loud noise from a sedentary position.

Mr. Gummer: I give my hon. Friend the assurance that the Government will not ask the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) to play a part in this committee because, as my hon. Friend says, he has not yet taken the same interest in his own fisheries.

8.45 pm

Mr. Onslow: I am sure that the House will be relieved to hear that.

Apart from the membership of the committee and the balance of its composition, I hope that the Minister will be able to tell us about staffing. Perhaps he will also tell us where it will be located. I do not even mind if the Committee is preponderantly Scottish provided that its headquarters are in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food rather than in Scotland. In many ways it is easier to get at MAFF and to twist people's arms and it is MAFF that probably needs its arm twisted most in these matters. That is purely a personal opinion. A more important point is whether the Minister can tell us more about the activities, duties and responsibilities with which he will charge this committee. In Committee we were much encouraged to hear that seal predation was high on its list of tasks. I share the anxiety about the effect of the enormously increased numbers of seals on the north-east coast that prey on salmon stocks.

The matters aired under new clauses 5 and 6 puzzle me. Perhaps I could look first at new clause 6. It is extremely difficult to understand how it can be said that salmon tagging will be an aid to more accurate catch statistics. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) has his Welsh water authority licence in his pocket, but if he has—presuming that he has such a licence—he should look at it some time. He will see that he is required to make a fairly exhaustive return of any fish that he is fortunate enough to catch. I do not see how a requirement on him to tag fish when he takes them out of the water will have the slightest effect on the accuracy of his statistics or will be of assistance to the Welsh water authority.

If someone were quick enough to find a stretch of water in Wales between now and Saturday in which he could fish for salmon and caught a hen fish and, if he were a sensible chap and returned it to the water, what would he do about that? Would he put a tag on it and bless it before returning it to the water? If the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor thinks this through he will understand that salmon are not like cattle. One cannot have fish swimming around in a river with tags in their gills in the way that cattle walk around the market with tags in their ears. First, one has to catch the salmon. What possible benefit to statistics is contained in new clause 6?

Mr. Wigley: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman is not aware that Mr. W. J. Ayton, the principal scientific officer of the Welsh water authority, has written to Welsh Members pressing for such a tagging scheme to be introduced. His reason is that the officers need this information in order to undertake their work. They are the experts and surely we ought to listen to them.

Mr. Onslow: We might listen to the scientist in the Welsh water authority if he could show why this clause should also be applied to England and Scotland. There has been no argument to show why it should be so applied. It may be and probably is a Welsh idea, but that does not automatically mean that it is a good idea to apply to the whole of the United Kingdom. Even the Welsh nationalists may understand that point of view.

The genesis of the salmon tagging scheme for the Welsh water authority area is embodied in new clause 5. That is not a conservation or statistical measure. It is designed to make it possible to catch poachers. I am extraordinarily surprised that we have not heard more about that purpose, because this scheme is designed to prevent the sale of illegally caught salmon.

Let us go back to the beginning. The hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) takes an occasional interest in these matters and he probably remembers the amount of work that was done by the water authorities to control the sale of salmon. He probably has a copy of the exhaustive report produced by Dr. Gordon Bielbey and his team in which the salmon tagging scheme was recommended. If the hon. Gentleman looks closely at it he will see that it was in order to prevent the sale of illegally caught fish and not for conservation, although poaching is a major threat to salmon stocks.

The hon. Gentleman does the House and the Department a discourtesy if he supposes that everybody, who takes an interest in these matters did not look closely at the practicability of this scheme. I know that Ministers looked closely at it. I discovered from conversations with them that they were not convinced that it was practicable to introduce such a scheme. I was disappointed to learn that, but ultimately I was convinced that they were right. If one looks at the implementation of the salmon tagging scheme, its weaknesses become quite clear quite soon. It depends upon the issue of a great number of tags and their application to fish that have been legally caught. A man with tags can apply them to fish that he has caught illegally. That is a major flaw in the scheme.

In respect of Wales, the major flaw is that its rivers are so close to England, if they do not actually form the boundary. If there were not a salmon tagging scheme in England that made it an offence to possess a salmon without a tag, that would be an open invitation to every poacher in Wales to take his illegally caught fish across the border as quickly as possible. Indeed, that already happens because modern poachers are so mobile. Poachers from Monmouth and Hereford poach in the Conwy with dinghies and gill nets. Recently two men from Monmouth were caught with more than 50 salmon valued at £1,000, representing a loss of 13 per cent. of the average rod catch in a year.

Mr. Livsey: I wish to clarify one point. The proposed tagging system does not mean tagging fish and then releasing them back into the water, but only tagging those fish that stay out of the water and are sold. The hon. Gentleman's remark about the men apprehended in Monmouth emphasises my point. If they were apprehended with salmon that were not tagged, it would be the end of the story. They would, quite rightly, be prosecuted. We all know that industrial poaching in Wales is severe.

Mr. Onslow: The hon. Gentleman is wrong because the men from Monmouth were prosecuted under current law and their car and tackle were seized. Therefore, there was no need for a tagging scheme to deal with those poachers. The three men from Hereford were using a dinghy and gill nets to poach the Conwy. If they had succeeded in returning to Hereford before being caught, they would have had no difficulty in disposing of the fish. We must catch the poacher on the spot. Whatever longstop scheme is being considered, the important safeguard is enforcement on the river and prevention of an illegal catch on the spot.

The Welsh water authority says that on the river Dee 150 boats are standing by ready to poach salmon. All this talk about salmon tagging would not come from Wales to anything like the same extent if it were able to field the necessary number of water bailiffs on the spot. If the rivers were actively protected, that would be the most beneficial defence. I hope that we do not lose sight of that.

The proposed dealer licensing scheme will also need to be monitored by the committee. We have yet to be told how it will work. If the scheme does not stop the illegal catching and sale of salmon, we will have to consider what further step is necessary. Again, I think that the best defence will be the water bailiffs. An elaborate bureaucracy built around the movement of metal tags will not be anything like as efficient as a man and a dog on the river bank.

Mr. Rowlands: I acknowledge the great deal of work done by the hon. Gentleman on behalf of those with trout and salmon interests. However, all those to whom I have spoken in Wales, including those in the front line, believe that a tagging scheme will be an important and integral part of their work of identifying what is legally or illegally caught fish. The hon. Gentleman questioned why the scheme should apply in England when it is a Welsh provision. I point out that both new clauses state that the provisions can be introduced in different cases if so desired. There is flexibility in our proposal.

Mr. Onslow: I should be more ready to accept the hon. Gentleman's argument if the proposed committee were already in existence and had reported on that matter. I hope that he will understand that a water bailiff who is trying to prevent poaching of salmon from his stretch of water is keen and skilled in the detection and prevention of illegal fishing. Whether or not illegal fishermen have tags in their pockets or satchels is neither here nor there. If the tagging scheme is to be of value, it must apply to salmon offered for sale. Dealer licensing exists to control the sale of salmon. I have heard no argument that shows that tagging is likely to be more effective than dealer licensing or why it is necessary to run the two schemes as complementary to each other.

Mr. Rowlands: I apologise for intervening again. Our point is that we believe that the two schemes are complementary—they are not alternatives. How, under the dealer licensing system, will anyone but the dealer know whether the fish was legitimately caught? At least if a fish is presented with a tag, the dealer will know that it was legally caught. If the fish does not have a tag, the dealer can question the bona fide character of the person offering it for sale.

Mr. Onslow: Perhaps, like me, the hon. Gentleman would be better to suspend judgment on that matter until we are told how the dealer licensing system will work and be enforced. It is premature to insist upon the introduction of tagging for salmon offered for sale. The provisions of new clauses 5 and 6 go much further than was originally suggested.

I am not anxious to detain the House any longer than necessary. I end as I began by saying that the Minister, in what he will say to the committee at the end of our debates, has an opportunity to show people both within and without the House that he is serious in his wish to promote the conservation of salmon in British rivers. I hope that he will give evidence of that by witnessing—especially in his MAFF responsibility — the fact that water abstraction, water pollution, the land drainage schemes and the afforestation schemes that affect the character of so many rivers—especially in Wales—and which have done such damage to Welsh rivers by turning them into gutters that simply carry away the run-off are matters as serious for the conservation of salmon stocks as anything that we have been discussing. I hope that the advisory committee will be encouraged to turn its attention to these matters as well as the other matters that have been discussed.

Dr. Godman: I promise to be brief. I regret that I was not a member of the Standing Committee, because I was assigned—or condemned – to the Social Security Bill Committee.

I wish to make one point about the exchanges tonight. When listening to some of the contributions from Conservative Members, I was reminded of the charges levelled by Louis Macneice against Oxford dons, when he said that they had charm without warmth, and knowledge without understanding.

What is needed is an advisory committee. That is why I support new clause 4. However, I have some reservations about the system of tagging, especially, as I said earlier, for fish farmers. Many of the companies are very small, and some employ no more than two or three people. They are frequently situated in exposed areas and work under difficult circumstances. I know that farmers also work under difficult circumstances, especially hill farmers, but I have reservations about tagging because of the problems faced by the very small enterprises in the islands off the coast of Scotland.

I should like to hear a few words from the Minister on the membership of the committee. I should like to know something about the chairman, although that will not be possible at this moment. I have no doubt that the Minister and his officials will choose the chairman with considerable care. I have no idea whether he will be a radical in terms of the approach to modern methods of conservation. However, I hope that such a committee will examine the commercial salmon fisheries on both sides of the border with equal care, because not all the damage inflicted upon rod fishermen in Scotland is inflicted by English drift net fishermen. I do not know much about the damage inflicted by the seals in Bridlington bay. The seal expert is present. I do not claim to be an expert on the eating habits of the seal.

I want to comment on what was said by the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro). He voiced his concern for the Scottish salmon fishery. A salmon beat owner said in the Glasgow Herald recently:

> "Angling in the upper and middle Tay in June, July, and thus far in August has been like playing golf at Gleneagles with no holes on the greens."

There is a serious problem.

That owner's concern over the activities of English drift net fishermen was shared by the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs in its report on fisheries protection. One of the recommendations in the report was:

> "There should be a ban on monofilament nets in all UK coastal waters, and the northern English drift net salmon fishery should reduce its catch to traditional levels, leading ultimately to its being phased out, with financial compensation."

That is, understandably, a somewhat biased recommendation, since there is no mention of the activities of commercial salmon fishermen in Scotland.

Mr. Beith: Did the hon. Gentleman not think it reprehensible that when making that report the Select Committee did not take any evidence from any representative of the North-East Salmon Fishery or any of the bodies involved in regulating that fishery?

Dr. Godman: As a member of that Committee, I am willing to accept that that is a fair criticism, delivered strongly by the hon. Gentleman.

Damage is inflicted by commercial interests in Scotland. The same copy of the Glasgow Herald stated:

> "The biggest of the Tay netters, the Tay Salmon Fisheries Company . . . reportedly sent more than 600 boxes of salmon and grilse to London during July, while the netsmen of Insch . . . and Barony fishings despatched more than 500 boxes in the same period. That does not take account of the salmon sold to local hotels and fishmongers, sold on Edinburgh and Glasgow fish markets or on the major north of England fish markets or to the Scottish smoked salmon industry."

If we are to criticise commercial salmon fishermen, we have to be fair-minded. Such fair-mindedness, perhaps understandably, was completely missing from the intervention of the hon. Member for Dumfries. The hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) offered a much more reasonable criticism and suggested that the weekly hours given over to net fishing should be reduced, and that makes a great deal of sense.

The committee should be in a position to commission research and monitor the commercial fishing activities on both sides of the border. If it examines the English drift net fishery, it must also analyse, in an equally rigorous way, the commercial activities north of the border. Such a committee must reflect the differences in the importance of the salmon fisheries in the countries that make up the United Kingdom.

Mr. Canavan: I strongly support reasonable conservation measures, which is why I have tabled new clause 9, calling for a moratorium on net fishing on the River Tay and its tributaries. In Committee we had many debates in which hon. Members on both sides called for a proper balance between the interests of rod and net fishing. Emphasis was put on the number of jobs involved in net fishing as well as the number of jobs involved in the spin-off tourist industries connected with rod fishing.

I do not want to interfere in the patch of other hon. Members who represent the interests of their area. My amendment refers to the River Tay and its tributaries only. It may be that the River Tay is sui generis. Some evidence was published in the Glasgow Herald on Monday 21 August, in an excellent article by James Freeman — it has already been quoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) — referring to reports that "Tay salmon netting interests have caught an estimated 20,000 fish during low water in the month of July . . . Ian Mitchell, managing director of Tay Salmon Fisheries and himself a keen angler, said yesterday that it was possible that the 20,000 figure was correct . . . Mr. Michael C. Smith, an elected member of the Tay District Fishery Board . . . said: 'These netsmen are doing more damage to our Scottish stock than all the Greenlanders, Faroese, and Northumbrian fishermen and the poachers and the seals put together.'"

This is a serious case of overfishing with nets on the lower reaches of the river, and the people on the upper reaches whose jobs are involved in the sport of angling are suffering the consequences.

By coincidence, on the day that that article appeared in the Glasgow Herald, I went fishing on the River Earn, a tributary of the River Tay, with a friend of mine. I spent the whole day there and caught nothing. That is not unusual with me, because I am not a good fisherman. I go fishing simply to get a bit of fresh air and recreation and to look at the countryside, and if I catch any fish, that is a bonus. However, my friend is an expert fisherman, and he also caught nothing. That is no wonder when one looks at the evidence of the overfishing that is going on in the estuary of the River Tay.

There are about 25 netting stations in operation on the lower reaches of the River Tay and one company, the Tay Salmon Fisheries Company, owns more than 100 netting stations. Granted it does not operate them all at the one time, but that shows the capability of one company to overfish those reaches of the river. The Government must take radical action to stop that. Ironically, the only action which the Government are proposing with regard to the River Tay is a protection order governing the upper reaches of the river, which will inhibit the opportunities of rod anglers. The Government ought to be attacking the net anglers in the lower reaches of the Tay, not the rod anglers in the upper reaches.

Of course there is concern about jobs. However many jobs there are in net fishing on the River Tay, there are more than 30,000 jobs in the Highlands dependent upon rod fishing. I submit that that figure is far in excess of any estimate which the Government can produce about the number of jobs in net fishing on the lower reaches.

Following the Committee stage of the Bill I half expected some letters of protest, because not everyone agrees with everything I say. I cannot understand that sometimes. After my contributions in Committee I expected a host of letters from trade union interests representing the netsmen on the River Tay, from the netsmen themselves, or from the Tay Salmon Fisheries Company telling me how important the netsmen are for employment prospects in the Perth area. However, I received not a whimper of protest. I wonder whether any other hon. Members of the Standing Committee received any whimpers of protest about employment prospects.

Mr. Home Robertson: I assure my hon. Friend that I am not going to whimper. In fact, I agree with everything that he has said. I should like to draw my hon. Friend's attention to the fact that the Minister was kind enough to send us a list of the number of people employed in the net fisheries on the various rivers. The list shows that about 162 people obtain employment, often of a seasonal nature, on the River Tay. I acknowledge that my hon. Friend's point is a serious one and that there is probably a need to review the fishing effort, but I believe that he is going a little far in seeking to write off those jobs straight away. Perhaps he should adopt a more softly, softly approach.

Mr. Canavan: I have experienced working at the net fishing on the River Tay. When I was a student more than 20 years ago, I had a job working on the River Tay during my holidays from university. At that time — and I suspect that the position has not changed much — the Tay Salmon Fisheries Company mostly employed and exploited students and temporary cheap labour. There was no trade union and we were paid 5s. an hour. We were not asked whether we could swim, and we were sent out in a boat into the middle of that fast flowing river, and beyond, to lay the net.

Because of the low level of pay and the danger involved, I do not believe that these jobs are worth defending. I shall not stand on the Floor of this House or anywhere else and defend them. The Minister may defend those jobs, but there are of course vested interests in the Tory party in that respect. It is not just the Duke of Argyll who is apparently illegally net fishing on Loch Fyne. Lord Mansfield, a former Minister, with a specific responsibility for the pre-legislative stage of the Bill, has a vested financial interest in the Tay Salmon Fisheries Company. I suspect that the muted attitude of Ministers and the Government Front Bench on that matter speaks for itself.

It is time that we took firm action against the people who exploit workers and the rivers, who are acting to the detriment of those who love salmon fishing as a sport, and who are also acting to the detriment of the employment prospects of those in the Pitlochry area and other areas further up the River Tay. I shall never defend such organisations as the Tay Salmon Fisheries Company, many of them the same inherited landlords to whom I have referred previously, whose motto seems to be, "I shall not sow, I shall not grow, but by heavens I shall reap."

9.15 pm

It is about time that justice was restored. All that I am proposing is a moratorium for a trial period. I have not even said for how long. If, after several months or years, it is found that a complete moratorium is too strict, it will be up to the Secretary of State to come forward with alternative proposals. We would then have the opportunity of debating them. That surely would be a far more democratic way of deciding the matter.

Dr. Godman: I remind my hon. Friend and the House that the Scottish fisheries Minister recently banned commercial fishing on Loch Ryan. Therefore, there is a precedent.

Mr. Canavan: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for mentioning that precedent. What I am proposing is not unreasonable or unprecedented, and I ask the House to accept it.

Mr. Beith: I welcome the setting up of the advisory committee. The new clause is about trying to firm up the details of the creation of the advisory committee, and perhaps the Minister will say something more about it.

I hope that the committee's membership will be sufficiently widely drawn to enable it to draw on the wide expertise that is available on salmon matters and to reflect the range of interests involved. It should not be a committee of interests, but it should contain people who understand the different fisheries and economic interests involved. It should not be seen to be biased in any particular direction.

As for the tagging proposal, I moved the new clause in Committee that would have enabled the Welsh water authority to have its wish to carry out a tagging experiment within Wales. We pressed the Minister extremely hard, but in the end he resisted. Subsequently, in his absence on important duties elsewhere, it fell to his hon. Friend to resist. I felt that, had the Minister been able to listen to the full and persuasive argument advanced in all parts of the Committee, and had he been present with his full authority, he would have been able to give a little more ground than did the Scottish Minister.

It is a perfectly reasonable request that this experiment should be carried out. It is an experiment upon which scorn has been characteristically poured by the hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow), who can rarely speak for very long without sounding either scornful, patronising or both. I hope that some day he will give that up.

Many people in the Welsh water authority who have a great deal of experience genuinely feel that this would be useful. It would make prosecutions easier and would ensure that the provenance of salmon held or transported anywhere in Wales had to be demonstrated. That is a perfectly sensible proposal. Wales is not an area in which there has been a great expansion in fish farming. The main expansion has been in Scotland, and the problems that can be dealt with there do not arise so acutely in Wales as in other parts of the United Kingdom.

The Welsh water authority should have been given its opportunity to carry out this experiment. There is now a fear that, were the salmon advisory committee to become persuaded that it would be a good thing, the powers do not exist to carry it out because they are not on the statute book. Ministers would thus have to come back to the House, with all the pressures of the legislative timetable, and seek an opportunity to bring forward another Bill. That is not very satisfactory.

I tabled a small amendment to the new clause designed to ensure that the House would have the opportunity to vote on the implementation of the tagging scheme rather than be confined to the extremely unsatisfactory negative procedure. I well know that that would be quite satisfactory to the movers of the new clause and to the Welsh water authority. I am disappointed that the Government have not moved further on that point. What would they do if the salmon advisory committee decided that such a scheme was desirable?

That brings me to the comments of the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), echoed briefly by others, on the north-east salmon drift net fishery. No fishery has been subject to more detailed restriction and control than that one. In conjunction with passing the Bill, many new controls and restrictions have been placed upon the north-east salmon drift net fishery. It now has far longer close time than any in the Bill or advocated for other fisheries. The weekly close time for the north-east salmon drift net fishery is 84 hours as opposed to 42 hours in Scotland, although there has been an argument for a slight increase in that Scottish 42-hour close time.

The hon. Member for Dumfries amazes me by his apparent conviction that the rivers on the west coast of Scotland are suffering great deprivation because of what takes place in the north-east salmon drift net fishery off the north-east coast of England. It simply cannot be the case that the west coast rivers of Scotland are so drastically affected by what goes on off the north-east coast of England. The effects of the north-east salmon drift net fishery—scientific evidence has shown it affects less than 7 per cent. of the Scottish catch—must be concentrated on the English rivers along the Northumberland coast, which have generally improving salmon catches, the River Tweed, which flows through England and Scotland, and a number of east coast rivers in the south-east of Scotland.

The north-east fishery cannot be held responsible for salmon catches around the entire Scottish coast. The vast majority of fish are caught by commercial netsmen in Scottish rivers. I agree with the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) that the only convincing case for a reduction in the salmon catch in Scotland is to reduce the commercial netting catch in Scotland. If the north-east fishery was banned tomorow the impact on Scottish rivers would be limited. A great many people would lose their livelihood for little gain, but it would be absurd if nothing was done about Scottish commercial net fishing.

All the decisions should be taken on the basis of conservation and a reasonable balance between those who have traditionally obtained their livelihood from salmon fishing and the need for conservation. That idea appears to have permeated the Government departments involved and it is present in the Bill. I welcome the fact that Ministers have realised that the livelihoods of different groups of people are involved. One cannot simply wipe away people's livelihood, especially if the effects would be as limited as the evidence suggests.

It is interesting to note that the condition of some of the rivers in the north-east is not as deeply depressing as the condition of rivers in other areas, especially Wales. Anyone who has studied the Tweed recently will notice that there are large numbers of fish in it. That has given rise to a good deal of poaching and the Tweed commissioners have had to take on a number of extra bailiffs.

A week ago I went to Norham in my constituency and saw for myself a river full of salmon. There was an extraordinary sight of an angler playing a salmon on his hook while other fish popped up around his boat, sticking their heads out of the water. A marvellous photograph of that event appeared in the local newspaper—taken no doubt not far from the stately dining room window of the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) as he gazed down upon the scene. The photo shows the angler with the salmon on his line and another popping its head out of the water only yards away.

Such a situation has arisen partly because of the low level of water in the River Tweed, and many fish were unable to get further up the river. It is not true that salmon in the river Tweed represent a collapsing resource and that sooner or later there will be none in the river. It is a resource that has to be carefully conserved and the best scientific advice must be obtained to ensure that that conservation takes place. All the interested parties must be given fair treatment.

These are the principles which we sought to keep in the Bill and which the Minister sought to enshrine in the Bill. Some of the restrictions placed on the Northumberland fishery will bear hard upon it but those fishermen recognise that they and others have to take their fair share of conservation measures. It is in their interests as well as everyone's that there should be salmon for everyone to fish in the future.

Mr. Gummer: I am pleased that we have had a long, important debate on the new clauses. It is perhaps the most important series of issues that will be raised on Report.

I accept very much the view of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall), that we should take the advisory committee very seriously, which he does. When the Bill was already prepared in large measure, I thought it worth while, as I came to it afresh, to look closely at the most contentious issues. I started with the clear view that salmon tagging was the right way to solve the major problem of the poacher and make a major contribution to conservation, for this is a conservation Bill.

We cannot distinguish between the stopping of poaching and the conservation measures because there is no doubt that very large numbers of fish are taken from rivers by poachers, which has a serious effect on conservation, not just because of the numbers but because of the methods used by poachers, which were so dramatically presented by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands). He rightly reminded us that the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) was very much out of date in the way in which he described poachers, who were family, furry individuals who fitted into every natural group and were merely taking the odd fish for the pot. That is not the person we are talking about, although I do not want to make the distinction that suggests that poaching in any cirumstances is acceptable. However, there is a type of poaching that is so unacceptable that anybody who has any interest in conservation must realise that it should be stopped. Connected with the poaching of salmon and the effect on conservation are violence and the use of methods that destroy rivers, which none of us could support.

Therefore, when I approached the matter, the idea of the tag attracted me considerably. Even had I been listening to every word on that day when the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) put forward with such enthusiasm the case of the Welsh water authority, I would still have had to say to him that I did not believe that I was right to think that tagging would solve the problem. Indeed, I take a stronger view than that. I believe that tagging has within it such inherent difficulties that it would make the problem worse because it would make people rely on the tags and, by relying on the tags, have a false sense of security. I want to express the argument carefully, and I want the House to be aware that I have taken seriously the arguments about tagging.

I have also sought to think about the arguments on an advisory committee. No such committee was envisaged when the Bill was first proposed. I responded to the pressure of my hon. Friends, not to have a simple way of getting off the hook, if we may use that phrase, but because I believe that an advisory committee is necessary for the Bill to have its full impact.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison) that the argument about the statutory nature of the committee, based upon the fear that such a committee might be abolished by the whim of a future Minister, is unreal. It is not a political possibility for a Minister, having set up such a committee, to take such a short cut with it without a reason that could be seen by all.

There are also other examples of advisory committees, at least in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, which are serious and important but which are not statutory. Their advice is taken seriously by the Ministry. The Farm Animal Welfare Council is an example. Therefore, the seriousness of the committee should not be determined by whether it is statutory. I prefer non-statutory committees because there is a flexibility about them that makes them worth while. This committee's seriousness must be judged by the House on the basis of what it does and of its membership.

In seeking to establish this committee we wanted to demonstrate that, above all, we are concerned with conservation. During the Committee stage I said that I did not believe that salmon should be treated as a food resource. I am pleased that that view has been taken up again this evening. Salmon are not primarily a food resource. If one looks at the figures, one sees that only 11 per cent. of the salmon eaten in this country are wild salmon. The rest are either farmed or imported salmon. Therefore, one cannot think of the 11 per cent. of British salmon that were caught last year as a food resource. One has to regard salmon as being very much more important to the leisure and tourist industries and to employment. Salmon as a food resource comes very low down the list.

9.30 pm

To ensure that that attitude prevails, we thought, first, that we ought to choose as chairman of the committee somebody who has a proven interest in conservation matters. Secondly, we thought that it was necessary that this person should clearly be seen to have had connections with the industry but that he should not be parti pris. That was difficult. I spent a great deal of time looking at very many names. Most of them turned out quite clearly to be on one side or another of the many arguments. Thirdly, we thought that it was necessary to have someone who would be able to deal scientifically with some of the fundamental issues relating to fisheries management that have been raised this evening. I am strongly of the view that one factor that has bedevilled a rational discussion of the issue has been the constant series of statistics that have been produced, all of which appear to contradict each other. There seems to be no way in which one can say that a particular list has to be accepted because it contains the most credible statistics.

Therefore, I am pleased to be able to tell the House that the regius professor of natural history at the university of Aberdeen, Professor Dunnet, who has the kind of experience that we need, has said that he is willing to become the chairman of this committee. I think that the House will be very grateful to Professor Dunnet. He has the additional advantage of being a Scotsman who lives in Scotland, who works in a Scottish university and who has a very close association with salmon research in Scotland. That, we feel, will give confidence to those who wish 80 per cent. of the salmon to be in Scottish waters.

As for the membership of the committee, I should have liked to present to the House this evening a list of those whom we had approached so that the House would know exactly who they were. However, I am unable to do so. It is important that the chairman of the committee should play some part in the discussions on the representation of a whole range of interests. The committee will advise those Ministers who have responsibility for fisheries. I hope that right hon. and hon. Members will agree that such a committee will be able to work better together if all its members feel that it is a representative body. I take the point that, on a per capita basis, it is not representative. However, we want a spread of representation right across the board. I have now completed my primary look at the range of people and organisations who feel that they ought to be properly represented. As my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) suggested, it is probable that a majority of those on the committee will represent Scottish interests because most salmon are caught in Scotland. It is vital that the committee should be seen as a committee of Great Britain and not as one that merely covers Scotland.

One of the criticisms in Committee was that we do not have a national salmon policy. If the advisory committee is to make such a policy a continuing one, it must represent the whole of Great Britain. For that reason, the secretariat will have a London focus, as the membership is bound to have a Scottish focus. The secretary will be a MAFF appointee. His deputy will come from DAFFS. There will also be an input from the Welsh. I have not forgotten that, and I hope to show why it is of great importance. I hope that it will be a committee whose structure, balance and spread will allow it to be taken extremely seriously.

I have already discussed with Professor Dunnet one or two issues which the committee will consider. The committee will meet before the opening of the new season, whatever happens. I hope that the Opposition will accept that, to all intents and purposes, that means the immediate setting up of the committee. The committee will deal early on with statistics. It will consider the collection of statistics and their reliability.

I shall draw to the committee's attention the points that have been made in the debate about the possibility of using tagging as a means of collecting statistics. I believe that there are real problems in that respect, and I do not underestimate them. The suggestion that tagging a fish makes the statistics drawn from that tagging more reliable presents some difficulty. I shall certainly draw to the committee's attention the discussion that has taken place. It will obviously be within its remit. I think that it would be absolutely natural for the committee to discuss that issue at an early date.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) will be pleased that I have already agreed that the question of predators is one that the committee should discuss closely. I hope that the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) will not be upset about that. However, there is indisputable evidence that, because there is no culling of seals, there are more of them, which suggests that there is considerable predation by seals on salmon. Even if that is not true, it is important to establish the truth. Much of the heat that has been generated by differing interests in the salmon world is generated because no one can be sure about that fact, because we have been unable to provide the authoritative evidence we should like to have.

That is why I put the predators issue high on the list. Everywhere I went people said, "I do not know why you are bothering about the poachers until you do something about the seals," or, "I do not know why you are bothering about the north-east fisheries until you do something about the seals." Those people may be entirely wrong, but we must discover that. Therefore, we have asked the advisory committee to take up the matter quickly.

Mr. Wigley: The right hon. Gentleman would have heard the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) say earlier that circumstances were different regarding the salmon in his river—I think, the Tweed. The pattern in that river is quite different from that in Wales. Is that not indicative that there are factors other than the seals, which presumably would not discriminate between the Dyfi, the Tweed and the Beauly, which affect stocks? Perhaps we have extenuating circumstances in Wales which need attention in that context. Can the Minister assure us that the Welsh Office will also be involved and that the focus will not just be on Scotland and MAFF in London?

Mr. Gummer: I give absolute assurance of that. Throughout the Bill we have been closely concerned with the Welsh Office. It has given its agreement to the terms of the advisory committee and there will be a clear Welsh input into the committee secretariat. There is no question about that. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that I do not say that it is all down to seals. I do not know whether it is down to seals. The trouble with most of these debates is that people have grown increasingly cross with each other when it is the facts and figures that they are disputing. That is true of the north-east drift net fisheries. I shall return to Welsh tagging because I should like to deal with it directly in a wider context.

The advisory committee will not deal with the north-east drift net fisheries because we said that a specific report would be laid before both Houses of Parliament three years from the passing of the Bill on netting in the north-east of England and off the east coast of Scotland in the rivers that we mentioned in our debates. It would be entirely improper to suggest draconian measures, such as closing down the north-east drift net fishery off the coast of England, when 60 per cent. of the fish that are netted are netted in the rivers of Scotland. That is precisely the reason put forward by hon. Members on both sides of the House. That would be wholly unacceptable. It is also wholly unacceptable to deal with the public right of working fishermen in that way without any reference to the private rights of others in another part of the United Kingdom. That is not the business of fair Government legislation.

For that reason, we set out to achieve two objectives. First, we would restrict still further the north-east drift net fishermen. Many of my hon. Friends have asked how quickly that would be done and I can tell the House that all the measures that we promised to put in place will be in place before the opening of the new season. Secondly, the measure to prevent the use of licensed nets by endorsees in the absence of a licensee is being introduced by clause 35 of the Bill.

[Mr. Gummer]

Both the Yorkshire and Northumbrian water authorities have made bylaws banning drift netting at night and standardising the weekend close time. We expect to be able to confirm them shortly. There are statutory limits to how quickly we can do that, but we shall confirm them shortly. This week I confirmed the Yorkshire water authority's order that will phase out seven drift net licences as the present licensees give up, and replace them with fixed net licences.

The two remaining measures are orders under section 28 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975 to allow the use of fixed nets throughout the Yorkshire and Northumbrian water authority areas respectively. We do not anticipate any difficulties with the Yorkshire water authority area, but the Northumbrian water authority order has met considerable opposition from anglers. We must ensure that it meets the requirements without in any way diminishing the effect.

I can assure the House that all measures will be in place before the next season. In those circumstances it seems perfectly right that in three years' time we should study the effect of all types of netting on the supply of salmon into all kinds of rivers. Then we might again have some figures and facts on which to make decisions, instead of one man constantly saying that it affects 7 per cent. of salmon and another constantly saying that it affects every salmon, including those that are a long way from the north-east drift net fishery. Facts will help considerably.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) will accept that we should proceed in this way. If he is right and it is recommended that we take considerable, tough measures, the Government must be prepared to take them. I have always said that. If it is true that there is a major danger, we must put conservation first. We started our discussion in those terms and I should like to end now by saying, in exactly those terms, that conservation must come first. I give that undertaking. If, between now and the end of the three years, the Government have evidence which shows that we must take further steps, we shall have to do so. We have the powers to do so. We do not have to rely on new powers. We could take those steps, and I give my assurance that we would so do.

Let me deal now with Welsh tagging. I intended, if it were possible, to tag, because I thought that tagging was right, but now I am convinced that it is not. The reason for that is that in every other country with the sort of problem that we have tagging does not seem to provide the answer. Our problem is that we would have to tag a large number of fish in a large number of places of disparate situation.

We cannot pray in aid the French. If we take every salmon that the French intend to tag, that is fewer than in one Scottish river. The French have fished all their salmon out. It is easy to have a tagging system if there are no salmon to tag. The idea that we should follow the French in conservation measures is difficult to accept, but to follow them in conserving something that they have already fished out is not sensible.

I have news fresh from Biarritz where they have been considering this issue carefully. There, they have presented a policy which, in almost every particular, the Bill is already applying. In other words, what we are trying to do and what we shall be doing with the powers provided by the Bill will, I hope, be able to provide exactly the sort of national salmon policy which the discussions in Biarritz lead us to want.

I know that the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney is a great devotee of the French and a great francophile, but what the French intend to do will not wash. They are not, at the moment, going to tag fish caught at sea, farmed salmon or imported salmon. They think that they might in the future. But consider the danger of tagging only some salmon. That gives the poacher the most wonderful thing that he has ever had. All he has to do is to get hold of a few tags and he legitimises his own illegitimate catch.

Let me explain why I think that the Welsh water authority is mistaken in its proposal. I wish it were not so, but if it is wrong to tag nationally because it cannot be done without creating opportunities for fraud so much greater than any advantage one might have, it becomes even more wrong to tag regionally or even in the Principality alone. Any salmon poacher who poaches salmon on rivers, particularly those which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Woking suggested, are close to the border of the Principality, has only to skip over the border and there is no need for tagging to take place at all. It does not make sense as an anti-poaching device. Indeed, it does something much more dangerous. Once again, it enables people to legitimise that which they would find it difficult to get away with without a tagging scheme.

That does not mean that I have closed my mind to tagging for ever. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney must accept that if, after going over a matter again and again to try to find a way of accepting it, one still cannot be convinced, it is not unreasonable to share one's pretty good certainties with the House.

Mr. Rowlands: I do not find it very convincing that the Minister has not closed his mind to the issue of tagging. Therefore, let me put a different proposition to him. If the Welsh water authority, a responsible authority, in conjunction with the Welsh Salmon and Trout Association, brings a detailed project for the conservation of salmon in Wales to the advisory committee, when will the committee be able to receive an urgent submission of that kind and advise on it which, if the Committee supported it, might then reopen the Minister's mind? Will he give me an assurance that such a detailed submission will be within the remit of the advisory committee?

Mr. Gummer: I have already given the assurance that, as soon as possible after the Bill's enactment, the advisory committee will seek to assess how effective its anti-poaching measures are. We shall not necessarily wait for the water authority, but may tell it that if, in the circumstances then obtaining, it wishes its proposals for salmon tagging to be considered, the advisory committee will look at the matter. I have already given that undertaking, and I believe it to be right. I understand that the water authority might say that its tagging scheme can run with, and improve, the dealer licensing scheme, but I hope that we can agree that when the committee has considered whether the dealer licensing scheme is operating satisfactorily, it can look at the Welsh water authority's tagging proposals if it then has any. I hope that the Welsh water authority will take to heart the point that it could considerably help its case if it considered the number of water bailiffs and others available. No one can say that it is sensible to have a partial salmon scheme.

I accept the point made by the hon. Member for Redcar (Mr. Tinn) about the cyclical pattern. One must be careful with the salmon figures, but that is why the committee has the matter as one of its first remits. I was unhappy about some of the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith), but he too is not convinced about tagging and that is only right. I hope that the proposals that we have put forward for the committee, the seriousness with which we view the matter, and the fact that it will be as representative as possible will make him happy to support us.

The experience of the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) as a student has given him a miserable view of anyone in the netting industry. I wish that he was not as biased against Scottish netsmen as some Scots appear to be against English netsmen. We should not be biased against rodsmen or netsmen. The aim is to try to conserve salmon. The hon. Gentleman's constant attacks on my noble Friends are a disgrace. They have a long history of supporting conservation measures and their probity is unquestioned, other than by the hon. Gentleman. If we hear again about how he was sent out in a boat as a student, we shall have to ask why he did not set up a union instead of complaining that there was not one for him to join.

Mr. Home Robertson: I am not complaining that the Minister has said a great deal about Scotland—that is fair enough in the context of his reply—but I invite him to clarify one important point concerning who the advisory committee will report to. The Minister said that the sponsoring Minister for the advisory committee on salmon conservation will be his right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

It is well known, and the Minister has acknowledged, that 70 per cent. of the salmon in British rivers are found in Scotland. A significant number of the recommendations made by the advisory committee would have to be implemented, or at least considered, by the Secretary of State for Scotland. Will the Minister say a little more about the relationship between the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in relation to that important advisory committee?

Mr. Gummer: I am sorry if the hon. Gentleman has not followed what I have been saying, but I thought that I made it clear throughout our debates in Committee that the committee is an advisory committee to the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Secretaries of State for Scotland and Wales. I have tried to show how we have attempted to meet the interests of all those concerned.

It is not acceptable for the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) to suggest that tagging fish is the same as tagging sheep. The two methods would not be the same. The problems are quite different, and it does not help to try to draw comparisons.

My hon. Friend the Member for Woking rightly said that we would come later to dealer licensing. I believe that that is the way to counter the argument on tagging. Indeed, that is why I have agreed to extend dealer licensing. It should cover the whole of the United Kingdom and not just Scotland. However, I assure my hon. Friend that I shall seek the advice of the committee on a whole range of matters, which will not exclude the dangers that he mentioned.

We have presented the House with a mix of a dealer licensing system, an advisory committee and a chairman who will clearly have the support of all salmon interests, and we have thus changed the way in which the salmon industry is viewed. I hope that the House will accept that the new clauses are unnecessary and that a fair wind should be given to our major proposals.

Mr. Randall: I shall be brief. The Minister has expressed doubts and uncertainty about tagging, but in Wales there is unanimity that it is essential to an effective system of conservation. There are successful tagging schemes in other parts of the world, such as Canada, and I believe that we too should gain some practical experience.

The new clauses would allow us to take powers, and we could then see what the advisory committee has to say about the technicalities of tagging. That is the best way forward, and it will ensure that we have a good system of conservation.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Salmon Bill [Lords] may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour. — [Mr. Maude.]

Salmon Bill [Lords]

Again considered.

New Clause 12

'ACCOUNTABLE DISTRICT SALMON FISHERY BOARDS

'(1) The Secretary of State by order shall have power to establish District Salmon Fishery Boards for such districts containing a fishery as he shall designate and shall provide that a majority of members of each board shall be nominated by the relevant local authority or authorities in such numbers as he shall deem appropriate, the remaining members of each board being elected in terms of Schedule 2 to this Act.

(2) A district salmon fishery board shall have the powers and duties conferred—

(a) on them under this Act; and

(b) by any other enactment on a district board within the meaning of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Acts 1862 to 1868; and references in any enactment, other than in this Act, to a district board within the meaning of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Acts 1862 to 1868 shall be construed as references to a district salmon fishery board.'. — [Mr. Donald Stewart.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 12, in page 12, line 6, leave out clause 13.

No. 13, in clause 14, page 13, line 37, at end insert—

'(1A) The press and the public shall be admitted to all meetings of district salmon fishery boards.'.

Mr. Stewart: Amendment No. 12 is consequential and I am happy to support amendment No. 13.

In his reply to the previous debate, the Minister said that conservation should come first. The Bill has little to do with conservation. When it was first published the Salmon Conservancy said:

"The balance of influence on the boards still remains in the hands of the major proprietorial interests whose eligibility for election to the board is determined by the value of the fishery. Co-opted anglers and tenant netsmen have restricted power only."

It is clear that under no circumstances can co-opted members outnumber proprietors.

The purpose of the amendment is to change that position. We want to make a start, albeit minimal, on community involvement in salmon fisheries.

Mr. Home Robertson: We made our position on the composition of the district boards very clear in Committee. As the Minister will recall, the Opposition voted against schedule 2, which provides for a 20th century re-enactment of a medieval system of proprietorial authority, with only a token presence representing other interests and without any voting power or authority.

All relevant interests, including the public, should be represented on the boards. However, having flogged the issue to death in Committee and voted against the Bill on a reasoned amendment on Second Reading, I could not think of much to add on Report. However, the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) has come to the issue as fresh as a daisy and tabled an uncharacteristically reasonable new clause to provide for proper representation and accountability for the boards. We welcome his support for the case that we have been putting to the Government for a number of months. We endorse the objectives of his new clause. As he may have noticed, I have added my name to its list of sponsors.

Amendment No. 13 stands in the name of the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), who is apparently unavoidably absent tonight. He will have noticed that I have added my name to his amendment. I wholeheartedly agree that district boards, which in effect will be statutory public authorities, should conduct their proceedings in public and that the press should be free to report on their deliberations.

Had the hon. Gentleman been in his place in Committee to move his amendment, I would have been happy to support him. As he is again not with us tonight, I am happy to say in his absence that, in principle, the Opposition are prepared to support his amendment.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): I wish to follow the example of brevity set by the two previous speakers. I wish to support new clause 12 because the considerable argument about the right balance on the boards between riparian owners, netsmen and anglers has convinced me that the proposed structure that locks co-opted members into a minority position should not be accepted.

As the Government have argued that they are trying to increase democracy through this measure, it is inappropriate that the rather dubious democratic structure that they propose will mean that that majority using the facility will be in a minority position.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling) rose—

10.15 pm

Mr. Kennedy: I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman knows all about minority positions, but I hope that he will forgive me if I do not give way.

The co-opting of anglers and tenant netsmen is something of a token gesture towards increasing representation. Efforts to introduce election rather than the system of co-opting have failed. However, there is no doubt that the balance of influence still remains in the hands of the major proprietorial interests whose eligibility for election to the board, as the right hon Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) said, is determined by the value of the fishery. Therefore, there is restricted power only for the co-opted anglers and the tenant netsmen.

Other interested parties, such as local businesses, hoteliers and representatives of local tourist boards, do not seem to be having the major input that we would wish, especially given the importance of the industry to the Highlands and Islands.

The Federation of Highland Angling Clubs and Association has been extremely diligent in keeping its local Members of Parliament and others, including my hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) who served on the Commitee, well informed of its views. I am extremely grateful on my behalf and on behalf of my hon. Friends from the Highlands and Islands to Mr. Bill Brown of Strathpeffer, who, as well as serving with the federation, is secretary of the Scottish Anglers National Association. He has been extremely active on behalf of that association. The Federation of Highland Angling Clubs and Association put it extremely well when it said:

"Our criticism must be in the clause which says that anglers should be 'co-opted'".

It points out that in opposing co-option it has made several suggestions, one of which would be that the

[Mr. Kennedy]

Secretary of State should appoint co-opted angler representation. The association looked to the system which operates with the purification boards as a comparison which the Government could have looked at. Concern has been expressed by groups such as the Highland regional council and, I am sure I am right in saying, by the Western Isles council and other tiers of local authority in the Highlands and Islands.

In taking this step forward to establish district salmon fishery boards under the guise of democracy, the Government have given insufficient input to local angling interests and local fishing interests as a whole. Essentially, within the new structure, they have consolidated the power and hold, which is not democratic, of those who have the biggest cash control and personal stake and interest in the industry. It is disappointing that the Government have not gone further.

Given that there is such a great deal of interest in the decisions which the boards will be taking, in the activities they will be carrying out and the functions they will perform, it is only right, especially given the long drawn out arguments, that if the Government are going down the road of democracy, which is what they argue, that meetings of the board should be open to the press and the public. In that respect I endorse amendment No. 13 which follows on from new clause 12 and stands in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed. I do not see that there is any convincing argument against openness of Government decision-making in this respect. It is sad that we do not have more openness in general in the composition of the fishery boards that are to be established, and, through that, more genuine democracy of the type that the Government have claimed.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I had no intention of making a contribution to the debate, but as the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) would not give way I shall make one point. It is an extraordinary argument that rests on democracy and suggests that Uncle Tom Cobbleigh and all should be involved in the deliberations of the boards. The hon. Gentleman is not arguing that the National Farmers Union, British Wool Marketing Board, the Red Deer Commission or other such organisations should have Uncle Tom Cobbleigh and all. No doubt he would argue that, in the case of the NFU, it is appropriate that decisions about farming and representations about farming should be made by those involved in it and who know something about it. There is ample provision in the legislation for outside interests to be represented.

The hon. Gentleman does not come to the House and tell us that more people should be involved in decisions about forestry or any other activity. It strikes me as an odd notion of democracy that says that everyone should be involved in the business of deciding how best to run or manage our rivers. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman does not give the considerable credit that is due to the many people who, as riparian owners, put in time, money and effort to make sure that our salmon interests are preserved and enhanced to the greater benefit of the community and to the considerable benefit of Scotland. The hon. Gentleman is simply perpetuating the old class war and playing to the gallery rather than looking at the interests of salmon fishing in Scotland.

The hon. Gentleman made no attempt to say how all these various democratic groups would make their financial contribution. Presumably, once again he is looking to the ratepayer and the taxpayer to foot the bill.

Mr. John MacKay: The new clause does what the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) wishes it to do. It changes the composition of the boards. We intend to retain the influence of owners on the boards because of their ownership of fisheries and their direct contribution to the boards' finances.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) is right. The interest of proprietors has been essential. Not all of them come from Burkes Peerage or the House of Lords. Most of those who own parts of rivers or rivers in my constituency are ordinary farmers or are in the hotel business or the like. They are not people like the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson), and their holding in the land is much more modest in size and value than that of the hon. Gentleman.

Such people have done a splendid job, and it is because of their efforts over the years, both collectively and separately, that the salmon stock in Scotland is not at the level that some of the pessimists would have us believe they would be. There is a great deal to be said for the principle that he who pays the piper calls the tune. We have recognised that other interests should be represented on the newly constituted district salmon fishery boards, which is why we have introduced representatives of the anglers and the tenant netsmen, who will have voting representation and play a full part in the operation of the boards.

It is not clear whether the local authority nominees which new clause 12 would require would have voting rights, but I presume that to be the intention. That would be manifestly unjust. One might see the argument put forward by the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) that those in the hotel and tourist trades, who have a direct interest in the fishery trade and looking after it and making sure that it prospers, should be involved but many of the proprietors and anglers on the board will have that interest.

Giving local government a majority on the board would change the balance of power entirely, from those who own the fisheries, pay the fishery assessment and are interested in the fishery assessment, to others who, however worthy they may be, do not. By their weight of numbers they would be able to cause the board to incur expenditure, perhaps great expenditure, without contributing a single penny directly or through the authority that they represent. The wise course is to stay with clause 13 and not support new clause 12.

I have given amendment No. 13 careful thought. I have some sympathy with it. I remember when I joined Oban town council many years ago fighting a battle to open council meetings to the public. However, I have concluded in this case—and I hope the House will agree—that it would not be appropriate to require the boards to open their meetings in the way that the amendment seeks. The co-option of anglers' representatives to the board can be expected to ensure a wider scrutiny of a board's activities, for example, through the reporting back procedure which the anglers will have for those whom they represent. There is nothing in the legislation to prevent the boards from inviting the public or the press to attend meetings. Perhaps newly constituted boards will bear that in mind.

It has been argued that as the boards receive no subsidies from public funds and are therefore not, as local authorities are, accountable to the public in a financial sense the reasoning that justifies opening local authority meetings to the public does not apply to the boards. Some hon. Members must know that many smaller boards hold meetings in the offices of their clerks. That may be the boardroom of the firm of lawyers who act as clerks.

I believe that it would be unreasonable to expect a board to incur avoidable expenditure by hiring halls just in case members of the press or public wish to watch the board's deliberations. That is not a sensible thing to ask the boards to do. That is not sensible expenditure or a sensible use of money and I hope that the new clause will be withdrawn.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): The Minister has a remarkably aristocratic view of the Highlands. The idea that the proprietors of the salmon rivers are the only people endowed with an understanding of what is in the public interest is preposterous. The suggestion that ordinary chaps are thoe who own stretches of salmon rivers bears no relation to the Highlands reality. I wish that the Minister would not try to pull the wool over our eyes. He will certainly not be pulling the wool over the eyes of his constituents, never mind the eyes of the constituents of my hon. Friends who represent the majority of the Highlands and Islands constituencies. If he continues to act in that way, he had better look to his laurels.

Local authorities are elected by the public in the areas and are well placed to represent the interests of those concerned that the fisheries should be managed to the benefit of the community. The new clause is a modest proposal. The Minister's lack of sympathy for the objectives of the clause will be noted throughout the Highlands. He has done nothing to ensure that there will be representatives of the tourist industry on the boards. He has also done nothing to ensure that there will be representatives of local anglers' associations or representatives of those who may have a specialist knowledge of the fishing industry but who have no commercial interest themselves. The constitution of the board is to be decided entirely by the disposition of those who happen, frequently by inheritance, to have acquired rights of ownership over rivers — rights often exercised exclusively, not for the benefit of the public.

The Minister is living in the last century, and it is about time that he woke up. It is about time that he recognised that not for much longer are the Scottish public prepared to see the God-given inheritance of these fishing waters disposed of as the private property of a handful of people whose forebears acquired them through no virtue other than their acquisitiveness.

If the Minister continues to dig in his heels and set his face against popular involvement in decisions about the preservation and improvement of fisheries in Scotland, he will reap much more drastic remedies.

10.30 pm

Sir Hector Monro: I had not intended to get involved in the debate until the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) got to his feet and behaved in an astonishingly ignorant way. He did not appear in the debate until 10.25 tonight and has taken no obvious interest in the Bill since it came to the House many months ago. The hon. Gentleman displayed his total ignorance of the management of the rivers in Scotland by quoting his own local boards and suggesting that that was the case throughout Scotland.

Does the hon. Gentleman know that the chairman of one of the best river boards in the south of Scotland, on the Annan, happens to be a school teacher and a local councillor? Is he aware that there are anglers on the local board? Is he aware that people interested in tourism are on the board? Just because the hon. Gentleman apparently has a particular dislike of the owner of a river in Thurso, he reckons that it is the same throughout Scotland. He ought to apologise for making disgraceful statements that are totally without knowledge of boards throughout Scotland. They do an exceptionally good job, manage the rivers well, let angling associations have adequate water and provide adequate water themselves.

As I told the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) hours ago, he could fish on some of the best salmon rivers in Scotland for £5 a day — on privately-owned water as well as on association water.

The House should take no interest in the criticisms of the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland who has turned up at this late hour.

Mr. Maclennan: Will the hon. Gentleman allow me?

Sir Hector Monro: No.

Mr. Donald Stewart: I introduced the new clause much more briefly than I would normally have done, and I am glad that other hon. Members have raised points that I wished to make. I am sorry that the Minister has turned down the new clause in such a cavalier fashion.

The Minister repeated some of the myths connected with the Bill. The myth that the working class in Scotland have beats on salmon rivers as a diversion from the darts club was effectively demolished by the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan). The other myth is that until recently these owners accepted that a man could take "one for the pot" and that nothing would be done about it. I cannot recall such a situation. They still believe that anyone poaching a salmon should be sent to Botany bay. They seem to regard this as more heinous than some of the worst crimes on the statute book.

The Minister also referred to what the owners had done for salmon stocks. I do not agree with salmon fishing off the north-east coast of England, but the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) made a valid point when he said that we should stop the netting of salmon in Scotland before we do so elsewhere.

I know a number of these owners who are netting their rivers. That is where conservation should begin. They are shipping the fish out to Billingsgate for a fast buck. If that were stopped there would be many more salmon going up the rivers. What the poachers are taking is a drop in the ocean, and I am sorry that the Minister did not accept the new clause.

Question put and negatived.

Clause 3

GENERAL REGULATION OF SALMON FISHERIES

Mr. Beith: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 4, line, at beginning insert

'When he considers it necessary to do so in order to conserve salmon stocks more effectively.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 2, in page 4, line 2, after 'appropriate' insert:

'and after taking into account the interests of any persons whose livelihood would be affected'.

Mr. Beith: These two amendments relate to provisions in the Bill by which the Secretary of State can make severe restrictions on the manner in which fisheries are managed. These restrictions may be contemplated for the best of reasons but they could have the effect of depriving certain categories of fishermen of their livelihoods.

If the Minister were to set a mesh size which was such that few salmon could be caught it would effectively destroy a particular fishery. If the Minister forbade a whole category of implements he would rule out an entire fishery. There are a series of provisions in the Bill which would enable the Minister to remove the livelihoods of groups of fishermen.

In Committee I sought to argue that a Minister should not have such powers without adequate parliamentary opportunity to consider the matter. I argued that the affirmative order procedure was the only reasonable way of doing so. At the moment the Minister can bring in an order prohibiting a category of fishing and the only thing that hon. Members could do would be to pray against the order. They would seek a debate — probably without success—on the Floor of the House. With luck it could be debated in Committee, but hon. Members would have no guarantee of a meaningful debate on the order. They would have no opportunity effectively to represent their constituents.

My argument for the affirmative order did not prevail as Conservative Members felt that this—in my opinion inadequate—procedure was all that was needed in such circumstances. I disagree.

Tonight, I have taken an alternative approach. I believe that the Minister should satisfy two conditions before he may embark on some of the actions that are open to him in the Bill. If the Minister seeks to exercise the powers in clause 3(2) he should do so only when he considers it necessary to conserve salmon stocks more effectively. I am sure that that is the Minister's intention, but it is just possible that a Minister may be persuaded, by argument, that one category of fishing should be abolished to improve the opportunities for another category. That is not a reasonable basis for exercising the powers available. The basis should be conservation.

If the Minister should decide that a specific net is bad, such a decision should be based on the conservation needs and with due consideration for the effect of such a ban on the livelihood of fishermen. Such considerations have not always featured in Government departmental practice. I have argued about this with the Minister on previous occasions in respect of other matters, including the ban on the carriage of monofilament nets. However hard the Minister tried, he left some fishermen with the feeling that they had not been properly consulted.

There should be a clear obligation to take into account the interests of those whose livelihoods may be affected by Government decisions. I hope that the Minister will say that that is his intention and that I have given an accurate interpretation of it. That would set a future pattern and give guidance to departmental officials. I would prefer such considerations to be contained in the Bill. The Minister must remember that conservation is the objective but that people's livelihoods are also involved.

Mr. Home Robertson: Amendment No. 1 shows that the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) is even more suspicious than I am about the Government's motives. The amendment would require the Secretary of State to make regulations on close times, mesh sizes and so on only

"When he considers it necessary to do so in order to conserve salmon stocks."

I confess that it had not occurred to me that any Minister, even this Minister, would introduce such regulations just for the hell of it or simply out of spite. However, I suppose that there is a case for guarding against such eventualities. Nevertheless, after the Minister's disgraceful response to the earlier debate I feel that he cannot be trusted to exercise his discretion fairly over this kind of issue. Therefore, I support in principle amendment No. 1.

Amendment No. 2 would ensure that before regulations are made account is taken of the interests of those whose livelihoods would be affected. I think that the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed is right. It became very clear in Committee that there are people who would not hesitate to take action to close down legitimate netting operations, regardless of the interests of those who had worked the fisheries for generations, according to traditional and properly regulated practices. The House should recognise the importance of those jobs, however few, seasonal, or part-time they may be, in small and remote communities. The economy of a rural area can be very fragile, and the loss of even part-time jobs can have far-reaching effects.

Right hon. and hon. Members recognise that it may be necessary further to restrict the netting effort, but any such measures must take proper account of those whose livelihoods will be affected. Therefore, I support in principle both of the amendments.

Mr. John MacKay: I admit that the inclusion of the words contained in the first amendment is superficially attractive, but their inclusion would involve danger. The suggestion of the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) would add a restriction. The Secretary of State may want to use his powers for purposes that are not strictly conservationist. They may, however, have an identifiable effect on, for example, the better management of a fishery. I do not deny that the existing regulations and any that will be made under clause 3(2) are essentially conservationist, in the widest sense of the word. However, to seek to qualify the Secretary of State's power by the amendment would be unsatisfactory, in view of the kind of questions and doubts that might be raised about the Secretary of State's power to act in the interests of the good management of salmon stocks. That is part and parcel of the conservation problems that the House has discussed.

As for the second amendment, in Committee I was far from convinced that anything other than a generalised requirement for the Secretary of State to consult such persons as he considers appropriate was necessary. I am still of the same mind. I hope that it can be taken as read that any Secretary of State, of whatever political persuasion, will have regard to salmon conservation, and also to other relevant matters, when he considers such questions and that he will consult all those who have an interest in and whose livelihood depends upon the fishery concerned. Obviously he will have to consider the views of interested parties, whether or not their livelihoods are directly affected, and he will have to weigh all these factors before deciding whether to make a regulation.

I see no advantage in picking out one particular group. I had hoped that in Committee I had given the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed sufficient assurances to allay his fears. I have tried again to give those assurances. I hope that I have said enough to convince the hon. Member that his fears are groundless and that he will withdraw his amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 6

ANNUAL CLOSE TIME

Sir Hector Monro: I beg to move amendment No. 4, in page 7, line 4, leave out 'only'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 5, in page 7, line 8, at end insert—

'(c) after consulting such persons as he considers appropriate.'.

No. 6, in clause 7, page 8, line 4 leave out 'only'.

No. 7, in clause 7, page 8, line 8 at end insert—

'(c) after consulting such persons as he considers appropriate.'.

Sir Hector Monro: Clause 6 deals with the annual close time. I am not arguing the case for that one way or the other. However, when we discussed the matter in Committee, the Minister opened the door to a system that can be adjusted.

According to the Bill, the Secretary of State can make a close time order only if he has been asked to do so by the district salmon board or, if there is no such board, by two proprietors of salmon fisheries in the district. It is conceivable that the proprietors of both upper and lower stretches could act in their own interests in declining to ask the Secretary of State to make an order, even though in the interests of conservation, and indeed in the interests of common sense, it is important to make such an order. I should have thought that hon. Gentlemen such as the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan), who bailed out as quickly as he arrived, and does not seem to like boards and proprietors, would have been pleased if the Secretary of State could step in where it is obviously essential that he should do so.

10.45 pm

In this simple case, all we are asking in amendment No. 5—

"after consulting such persons as he considers appropriate"—

is for the Minister to step in and deal with the matter if malpractice, inefficiency or incompetence is taking place. It is conceivable that two proprietors might be in cahoots and they may not wish to have an order made that might be to their disadvantage but to the advantage of the river. I quite accept that the board would be in a position to advise the Minister on its interests. However, I am referring to a case where there is no board and where proprietors might not be acting in the interests of the river.

Throughout the Bill, the Minister, off his own bat, or on the advice of the board, takes powers to do a whole host of operations, yet he is not prepared to do so in the case of close time or in terms of estuarial limits. I have considered what he said in Committee, and I wonder what his objection is to taking steps when it is essential to do so. If he says that the amendment is defective or that something is wrong with its drafting, I shall be all the more disappointed, because he has known, since the Committee stage, that I would put down an amendment. He might well have put one down himself. I shall listen with interest to his argument as to why he will not accept what seems to be a simple, logical and worthwhile amendment which everybody with whom I have discussed it in the fishing world thinks is admirable.

Mr. John MacKay: My hon. Friend's amendments have again raised the question of annual close times and the way in which the Bill seeks to change them. In Committee, I undertook to reflect on the points made by hon. Members, including my hon. Friend, and to bring forward an amendment if I were more convinced about the case on reflection than I was at the time. I am afraid that the fact that I have not brought forward an amendment shows that I have not been persuaded by the arguments.

I do not think that any hon. Member would seriously wish that annual close times, which last for 168 days and have different dates for different districts, should be solely within the discretion of the Secretary of State. Annual close times have been fixed in the past according to local considerations, such as the timings of the runs of fish, and so on. Those changes in the dates that have taken place over the years have been made at the initiative of district boards which have had to petition the Secretary of State. I am not aware that any great difficulty has been caused by that procedure, other than in areas where there are no boards. We have sought to deal with this in future by enabling two proprietors in a district for which there is no board to apply for the sorts of changes for which the Bill provides—that is, for the extension to the period of the close time as well as changes to dates.

My hon. Friends would, in effect, wish me to provide that a board's decision not to apply for a change in the annual close time be subject to appeal to the Secretary of State. Presumably such an appeal would be made on behalf of local interests, but I wonder whether that would necessarily be the case. I doubt very much whether what should be a local issue would not be in danger of becoming a cause celebre of national proportions. The plain truth of the position is that, were we to go down the road that my hon. Friend invites me to go down, there would be little point in the power being given to the district boards and proprietors in the first place. We might as well treat alteration to the annual close time as a national issue from the outset.

I understand that my hon. Friend's concern is about conservation and controlling the balance of exploitation between nets and rods. We should look, not to the extension of annual close time, but to the extension of weekly close time. In Committee, I undertook on many occasions—I am happy to do so again—to consult on weekly close time with particular reference to whether Saturday morning should continue to be part and parcel of the open time for net fishing as soon as the Bill was enacted.

My hon. Friend's amendments to clause 7 fall within the same general principles—the question of estuarial limits and so on. These matters should be left to local initiative and responsibility. Local boards should bring them to the Secretary of State. If the Secretary of State were to be given power to act without an application, we might as well give him all the powers from the beginning, rather than have the ball played first by the district boards.

I know that my hon. Friend will be disappointed, and that I have not managed to convince him in the past few weeks. However, on balance the Bill is correct. The initiative should come from the boards and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State will have the power, after he has gone through the various consultation procedures, to act to ensure that all the local interests involved have their say.

Mr. Home Robertson: The Minister would say that, would he not? I was a little suspicious of the motives of the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) in tabling the amendment. I wondered whether he sought to get round the rudimentary representation of the netting interests on the boards.

I welcome one factor in his speech. He recognised what we in the Opposition have been saying all along which is that in some circumstances the boards may note the most appropriate bodies as they are at present constituted to deal with the wider interests involved in Scotland's salmon rivers and lochs and to do the job that the House wants them to do. I welcome the hon. Gentleman's apparent conversion on that point and I am glad that he and some Opposition Members are raising questions about the efficacy of the boards.

Sir Hector Monro: I am disappointed in the Minister's reply. I am not arguing about the position of the district boards. They exist to advise the Secretary of State and to require him to make an order. I am concerned with the estuarial limits and the close time where there is no board and the proprietors may not be acting in the best interests of the river and of others who may wish to fish on it. I cannot see why in those special circumstances the Minister should not be prepared to take the decision into his hands, especially since he has already taken enormous powers under the Bill, many of which I welcome, particularly those relative to weekly close times. I cannot understand why he is prepared to bury his head in the sand or the water or whatever when a river may be being ruined by two proprietors who have got together and refused to take action. This is a simple, worthwhile amendment and I am most disappointed by his attitude.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: I know well the views of my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) and I have heard what the Minister has had to say. I should like my hon. Friend the Minister to know that his reply is disappointing. A major criticism of the Bill is that it does not grasp the nettle of estuarial interests. It is feeble in that respect and I hope that we shall return to battle this out through the committee that is to be set up and persuade other Ministers on another occasion of the wisdom of my hon. Friend's remarks.

Clause 9

APPLICATION OF REGULATIONS AND ANNUAL CLOSE TIME ORDERS TO THE RIVER TWEED

Amendments made: No. 8, in page 9, line 15, after '6', insert

'and section (Use of baits and lures)'.

No. 9, in page 9, line 34, at end add—

'; and

(d) section (Use of baits and lures) of this Act includes power to amend section 6 of the Tweed Fisheries Amendment Act 1859.'.

No. 10, in page 9, line 36, after '6', insert ',10'.—[Mr. John MacKay.]

Clause 10

QUALIFIED PROPRIETORS AND UPPER AND LOWER PROPRIETORS

Mr. John MacKay: I beg to move amendment No. 11, in page 10, line 30 leave out subsection (6) and insert—

'(6) Subject to subsection (5) above, a qualified proprietor in a salmon fishery district shall not be eligible for election, co-option or appointment to the district salmon fishery board for that district in respect of more than one salmon fishery.'.

The amendment clarifies the intention of subsection (6). We want to ensure—and have done so in subsection (5)—that a qualified proprietor who is both an upper and lower proprietor in a district may act in either or both capacities. Nevertheless, where he owns more than one upper fishery, or more than one lower fishery, he should not be eligible to be elected or co-opted to the board for that district more than once in the same capacity—that is, as an upper or lower proprietor—and this minor amendment makes the position clear.

Mr. Home Robertson: We had some interesting debates in Committee on the subject of one man, one vote—or, as in this case, one proprietor, one vote—and we established that mulitple proprietors would apparently have multiple votes. Indeed, I rashly referred to them in Committee as "block votes". If we were to extend that principle to the other place, I suppose we should find that the Duke of Buccleuch and Queensberry would have two votes—one for Buccleuch and one for Queensberry—and that in this House the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. MacKay), the Minister, would have one for each. He should be so lucky.

I gather that the amendment will mean that a multiple proprietor with both upper and lower fishing rights will not be eligible for election, co-option or appointment to a district in respect of more than one fishery, and I suppose we should be thankful for small mercies.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 14

FINANCIAL POWERS AND DUTIES OF DISTRICT SALMON FISHERY BOARDS

Sir Hector Monro: I beg to move amendment No. 14, in page 14, line 4, at end insert

'provided that such assessment shall not be assessed on any lower proprietor who has abandoned his fishery for a period of twelve months prior to the date of assessment.'.

I feel equally strongly about this amendment and I hope I shall have better luck with it. We debated this issue in Committee, and while the Minister was not particularly encouraging, at least he did not shut the door in my face. Since then I have been in correspondence with him and I trust that he has given the matter further thought.

In debating the Bill tonight hon. Members have expressed concern about the need for conservation — how we want to get rid of nets, but without affecting existing fishermen. The amendment deals with proprietors and others who are buying out nets and abandoning them, the result being that the areas are not fished at all, and that must be in the best interests of conservation. The Minister seems to think, however, that an amendment to remove the assessment is inappropriate, and that the particular amendment is not best drafted. I have been waiting to be advised of a better word than "abandoned", and if that advice is forthcoming I shall be willing to amend the amendment, if there is time to do so. The dictionary tells me, however, that "abandoned" is the best word.

We have a new organisation in Morayshire, called the North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organisation. Some fishing enthusiasts have come together to form a charitable trust to purchase netting interests throughout the Moray Firth. That is what it has been doing, to allow more fish to enter the river so as to build up stocks. Surely that is highly commendable. The Minister should be saying, "Thank goodness that some people are doing what we all want to be done." No one is any the worse off, because the fish are coming up the river to add to the stocks to the benefit of the entire river.

When the assessment issue arises, however, the Minister says that he will not accept the amendment. When proprietors are doing good work, surely we should assist them by reducing what they have to pay in the form of assessment. I cannot understand why the Government are being so abstruse and objecting to the amendment. The principle is right, irrespective of the drafting, and I cannot understand why I am not receiving a green light from the Treasury Front Bench. I await the Minister's reply with interest.

Mr. Home Robertson: I understand what the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) is saying about the principle that there should be no assessment of what he terms "abandoned lower fisheries", but the thread of his argument is that there is a need to do away with some or all of these fisheries, which are the netting stations on our estuaries. The hon. Gentleman is suggesting that proprietors who achieve that end are doing a good thing. I have no doubt that if we were to read the reports of the Highland clearances we would find that some said that it was a good thing to do away with crofters. That may be an extreme parallel, but the hon. Gentleman is talking about closing down traditional and properly regulated industries which provide part-time employment for a few people. We should be cautious before we take that path. Apart from direct employment, consideration must be given to the other benefits to local economies.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) knows the Tweed almost as well as I do, and I think that he would agree that the area would lose much of its attraction if it were no longer to be the scene of the catching of salmon by net in the traditional way — in other words, in a properly regulated fashion underneath the bridges of the Tweed. If the hon. Member for Dumfries is not careful, he will find that there is that loss.

I accept along with everyone else that there will need to be a restriction placed on the netting effort, but I want the restriction to be properly regulated in a way that is seen to be fair. I hope that the advisory committee under Professor Dunnet will be able to make sensible recommendations that will bear on all sectors of salmon fisheries. I am going rather wide, but I have been goaded by the hon. Member for Dumfries.

Mr. John MacKay: The hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) is being a little unkind to my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) because he is talking about people giving up their netting right voluntarily.

I have some sympathy with the argument. Since the Committee stage we have obtained the views of the Association of Scottish District Salmon Fishery Boards. The association is concerned about the effect that the amendment could have on matters to which I referred in Committee — for instance, the possibility of proprietors of netting stations opting in and out of the fishery assessment and the difficulties for boards in deciding whether a fishery had in fact been abandoned.

The association has concluded that an amendment such as is proposed is not necessary and that the powers vested in boards under clauses 14 and 15 are sufficient. The association's views have reinforced my own doubts about attempting to regulate in this complicated area.

Clauses 14 and 15 were deliberately drafted to give boards wide general and financial powers and my view is that we should rely on these. The association envisages that these powers would, for example, enable it to deal with the question of the fishery assessment on abandoned, or perhaps suspended, fisheries by administrative means. A board could levy the assessment in the normal way but make an annual payment to the proprietor, equal to the amount of assessment levied in the relevant year — always assuming, of course, that the finances of the board permitted that or that it had a chance, perhaps for a transitional period, to allow that to be done.

My main concern is that my hon. Friend's amendment for automatic exemption from the fishery assessment would produce immediate loss of revenue without the scope and time for arrangements which might be possible under agreements made between a board and a proprietor. Any loss of revenue would result in problems for the boards in enforcement and employing bailiffs.

The problem is not exactly black and white. Leaving each board and each proprietor to reach agreement according to the circumstances is reasonable. I am taking a close interest in what is happening in the Moray firth area where some nets have been withdrawn and problems are being caused. At this time of night I do not want to go into the complications.

I am sorry to disappoint my hon. Friend twice, but I hope that he will accept that the machinery exists for a board to take action. Given the consequences that could befall a board if the automatic provision which he proposes were agreed, it is best to rely on the provisions in the two clauses.

Sir Hector Monro: The hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) should consider the analogy of an empty building. If one abandons a fishery, why should one pay a fishery assessment any more than one would pay local authority rates on an empty house? As the Minister said, we are discussing voluntary purchases and no one has been put out of work as a result.

Letters which I have received from the North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Trust show that the initial operation has been successful. It is sad that assistance is not to be given for assessment. We are leaving the boards as judge and jury in their own cases. The boards are not likely to remove an assessment when they know that they will then lose money. I am disappointed. The Government's decision is a slap in the face for the conservation trust which is doing so much, and to others who are trying to buy out nets to improve the stocking of rivers. There are many conflicting interests involved in a Bill of this sort.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 17

TENURE OF OFFICE

Mr. John MacKay: I beg to move amendment No. 15, in page 17, line 4, leave out from 'he' to the end of line 5 and insert 'shall cease to be a member of that board'.

The hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) tabled an amendment in Committee to do what our amendment provides and I was prepared to accept it, but the hon. Gentleman was not present to move his amendment. Indeed, he is not here now to hear me say that, having not had the opportunity to accept his amendment, I have brought forward my own.

Mr. Home Robertson: I must jump to the defence of my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan). I suspect that he would have been so acutely embarrassed at being supported by the Minister that he has absented himself briefly.

I understand that the amendment means that, where a person has ceased to meet the requirements for membership of the board and is no longer a qualified proprietor, he will automatically have to come off the board. Originally it would have been possible to remove a board member only by a resolution of the board. I suppose that that was in keeping with some of the principles of the Bill.

I was a little alarmed that my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West had suggested the amendment, because it goes along with the characteristically enlightened principle that boards will represent and consist of the proprietor, the whole proprietor and nothing but the proprietor, which is a principle that we view with a mixture of disgust and despair.

How do we know when someone has ceased to be the proprietor of a fishery? If a board member surreptitiously sold his fishery—I admit that that is unlikely—or gave it away to a member of his family, how would the rest of the board or anyone else know that the qualifying ownership had ceased? If the member remained on the board, could that invalidate the proceedings of the board retrospectively? There is a problem for the Minister to conjure with.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 19

ADDITIONAL POWERS IN RESPECT OF LICENSING AND REGULATION OF SALMON DEALING

Mr. John MacKay: I beg to move amendment No. 16, in page 18, line 25, at end insert

'but not so as to enable these powers to be exercised in any dwellinghouse or any yard, garden, outhouses and pertinents belonging thereto or usually enjoyed therewith'.

As the House knows, some misgivings have been expressed about the possible extent of the powers of search and entry that may be given to water bailiffs under dealer licensing. We had a long debate on the subject in Committee. I have reflected on it and am conscious of the continuing worry on the matter, and I think that it would be desirable to carry the undertaking that I gave in Committee into the Bill. I hope that the House will welcome the amendment.

Mr. Home Robertson: It was an understatement for the Minister to say that there are misgivings about this matter. I stress that the Opposition support the principle of dealer licensing and we are glad that it has been beefed up during the passage of the Bill, because it would have been absurd if, as the Government originally suggested, dealer licensing had applied only to Scotland. To be effective it must be a national scheme.

However, I am very worried that the Government have jettisoned several fundamental civil liberties to make it easier to enforce the dealer licensing system. In Committee we discussed bailiffs and their powers of search and entry, and we welcome the concession in the amendment, which will at least prevent bailiffs from entering and searching people's homes and gardens.

The Minister knows that we are profoundly worried about the way in which bailiffs are selected, appointed and controlled and governed. Obviously we need people to enforce the regulations—that is what bailiffs are meant to do—but the Bill gives wide powers to people who are, in effect, the appointees of the proprietors and do not have to be vetted by the police or have formal training. Indeed, I understand that some foreigners have been appointed as temporary bailiffs. People from South Africa and goodness knows where else have been taking on such jobs.

I acknowledge that the vast majority of bailiffs are honest and conscientious people who do an important job responsibly, but we have all heard the horror stories, and we related some of them in Committee. We heard a lot about what was happening on the Grimersta estate in the Western Isles. More recently I heard that a bailiff on the North Harris estate broke somebody's jaw in the course of carrying out his duties. In another case, another bailiff on the same estate threatened to "shoot like a seal", as he put it, somebody who he found swimming in the loch in that area. There are some hair-raising bailiffs going around, and something ought to be done about the way in which such people are trained, vetted and governed.

There is a need for better provisions for governing bailiffs, and it would be intolerable for such people to go into people's homes. We are certainly thankful for small mercies and welcome the significant concession made by the Minister. He has at least made it clear that such people will not be allowed to enter people's homes and gardens and buildings around their homes in the course of their investigations.

11.15 pm

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): I welcome the Minister's amendment. I was entranced by the prospect of South Africans wielding sjamboks while patrolling our rivers, but the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) was right to spell out some of the nasty incidents that have taken place. One of the objections that many had to the original provisions was the idea that water bailiffs could have powers that would not necessarily be held by the police. Even if they were held by the police, they should never be conferred on people without qualifications or training in the work that they are doing. The amendment is useful for the protection of civil liberties and on that basis I agree with it.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. John MacKay: I beg to move amendment No. 17, in page 18, line 26, leave out subsection (2).

Members of the Committee will remember that this amendment was tabled by Opposition Members who expressed some doubts about this clause. Their doubts centred on possible loopholes and I said at the time that I understood the difficulties. With some trepidation, I am now doing that which I was asked to do. I hope that that does not mean that we are to have a long debate about it, as happened on the last amendment. I understand the difficulties and the best way to resolve them is to remove subsection (2) so that nothing is pre-empted. In the order introducing the dealer licensing scheme we will specify the class or classes of salmon or dealings in salmon that are to be excluded from the scheme. I am doing what the Committee asked me to do, and I hope that will be welcomed.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 21

OFFENCE OF POSSESSING SALMON WHICH HAVE BEEN ILLEGALLY TAKEN KILLED OR LANDED

Mr. Wilson: I beg to move, in page 19, line 29, leave out from '(a)' to 'is' in line 30.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 19, in page 19, line 29, leave out from 'believes;' to end of line 32.

No. 20, in page 19, line 31, leave out

'it would be reasonable for him to suspect'

and insert

'he had grounds to believe'.

No. 21, in page 20, leave out lines 8 and 9.

No. 30, in clause 31, page 26, line 35, leave out

'it would be reasonable for him to expect that'

'has grounds to believe'.

Mr. Wilson: I should like to speak also in support of amendment No. 21. The provisions of clause 21 are totally obnoxious. I do not know from which legal code they have been dredged, but any provision in statute which starts from the assumption or presumption of guilt is abhorrent to all of us. No doubt the Minister will be able to provide some precedent, probably an earlier statute, for the wording given in clause 21 7A(1)(a). The wording reads: "is in possession of salmon and believes".

I have never come across a clause couched in such subjective language. How can one prove that somebody believes something without exposing that person to some kind of drug or hallucinatory interrogation to find out what they may or may not believe? It is not practicable, nor is it capable of being proved in court. Clause 21 7A(1) (a) is unnecessary and undesirable and should be removed.

That would still leave paragraph (b) relating to being in possession of salmon. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) has tabled an amendment on that point. The offence that the Government want on the statute book is, I presume, a rewording of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries (Protection) (Scotland) Act 1951. Certainly the offence of being would be a legal minefield when interpreted by the courts.

"in possession of salmon and believes"

My views on the purpose of amendment No. 21 are even stronger than on amendment No. 18. I have already stated my dislike of the presumption of guilt that is a central part of the clause. We should especially consider subsection (3), which I want excised. It states:

"It shall be lawful to convict a person charged under this section on the evidence of one witness."

That flies wholly against the evidentiary requirements of the law of Scotland, under which a person should be presumed to be innocent until proved guilty. The burden of proof lies with the Crown, and that is enforced by higher standards than apply to civil law and must be beyond all reasonable doubt.

It is worth reminding the House that in the Slater case in 1928 Lord Clyde said that the innocence requirement was "fundamental to the whole system of criminal prosecution. It applies to every person charged with a criminal offence in precisely the same way and it can be overcome only by evidence relevant to prove the crime with commission of which he is charged."

I suspect that a charge of being in possession of salmon would be as important to the accused person as would be the charge for someone accused of murder, robbery, rape or whatever. In other words, the same standards should be applied to each and every criminal charge.

An essential part of the criminal law of Scotland is the corroboration of evidence. I am well aware that where someone is in possession of property that has been proved to have been stolen the accused can be under an obligation to explain the circumstances by which he acquired it. The Crown does not have to prove dishonest intent. However, in all cases it is essential that the Crown proves both possession and that the goods were stolen. The onus is on the Crown to do that by corroboration.

Other than that provision, under Scottish law no one can be convicted on his own confession without corroborating evidence or evidence acceptable to the court that not only stands on its own legs but is supported by additional information. For example, there could be corroboration by two or more witnesses or by one witness who can be supported by facts and circumstances giving rise to that corroboration. In this instance we are running counter to the basic rules of justice.

I do not know why this has found its way into the legislation. It may simply be because in the past the landed interests had an exceptional amount of power, almost feudal power, and were able to impose their will. Crimes against property or thefts of large sums of money sometimes, even today in the courts, seem to be penalised more severely than cases of murder. Human life is sometimes seen to be less sacrosanct than property.

It is a minority who own salmon fisheries and they are given exceptional powers of protection under this legislation. I earlier welcomed the amendment moved by the Minister to prevent water bailiffs from being able to go into private houses. However, that still leaves us with the unfortunate situation, outlined by the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson), whereby water bailiffs, without any training, will be able to give evidence to the courts and the evidence upon which conviction can take place is that of one witness or one water bailiff.

The reason why, in the past, courts have insisted on corroboration is that it is wrong to trust human nature. Indeed, there may be a temptation for a water bailiff to tell lies or, if he bears a grudge against an alleged poacher or knows somebody has been poaching but there is no evidence, to plant a salmon. It may well be that the poacher or person dealing in salmon could be correctly dealt with under criminal law and have truly committed the offence, but it may be that an innocent person is found guilty. Even with the laws of corroboration, there are still people who have been convicted by the courts and who are subsequently pardoned because the fallibility of justice has been shown to exist. The exercise of justice is a human matter and all of us are subject to error.

In cases of the possession of salmon, I would prefer the judgment to be made by the courts in the light of the general criminal law of the country and on the laws of evidence as they apply to all other crimes, instead of giving special rights to fishery owners. In its present form this is very primitive. It is the sort of thing that may come up in legal systems that are still in the course of development but which in more civilised times would have been altered so as to provide fairness.

I do not know where the law has come from. I am not sure whether the law of corroboration is the same in England as in Scotland. However, it is generally accepted in Scotland that nobody can be convicted without evidence which is not only credible but corroborated. I suggest to the House that it would perpetuate bad law if we provided rules of evidence for the possession of salmon which we are not prepared to allow in connection with other offences, both serious and minor. It is the duty of the House to remove bad law when it comes across it; otherwise, if one goes back to some of the rules that existed, especially in England, with regard to poaching offences for game or salmon, the lopping off of hands or transportation might still be appropriate punishments. We got rid of those punishments years ago and I suggest that now is the time to remove this relic of the poaching or game laws.

We are not talking of a minor offence. The penalty on summary conviction can be three months' imprisonment or a maximum fine. I am not sure what the maximum fine is these days — it is jacked up all the time to meet inflation — but it can be three months or perhaps something in excess of £1,000 as a fine, or both. If somebody is taken on indictment, it can mean two years' imprisonment or an unlimited fine, or both. That should not be visited on any citizen of any country on the unsupported testimony of one witness.

11.30 pm

Mr. Home Robertson: Amendment No. 18 had me a little baffled, because it takes out the only justified paragraph in the clause — the one that provides that those who know that they have committed an offence can be prosecuted. I support the second amendment of the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson), amendment No. 21—he may have noticed that I put my name to it —which concerns corroboration. This issue was debated fully in Committee, and we voted against the situation in which somebody could be convicted of possessing salmon simply on the evidence of a single bailiff, when in all probability the bailiff was the employee of the water proprietor in question. As the hon. Member for Dundee, East said, it would be far too easy for somebody to plant evidence and lie to the court. It would be outrageous if somebody were to be convicted under those circumstances. It would invite the court to convict on unsafe grounds, and Parliament should not pass such sloppy and potentially dangerous legislation. It is our duty to protect the innocent, and that should never be superseded by our enthusiasm to punish the guilty.

Amendment No. 19 and amendments Nos. 28 and 30 in the name of the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) are intended to restrict the scope of the prosecution under the clause to those who have knowingly committed an offence. They cover the point about the presumption of innocence being brought into this procedure rather than the abhorrent principle of the assumption of guilt, about which we should all become worried.

As drafted, the Bill will make it possible to convict people who should have known that they were committing an offence. Who should have known and who should not have known whether they were committing an offence when they were purchasing salmon? The world may be full of nasty suspicious people such as the Minister and me, who always assume that others have the worst possible motives, but just because we spend our lives in the company of politicians we should not overlook the fact that there are some honest, decent simple and straightforward people elsewhere in the country. If somebody were to come up to the Minister or to me and offer a fresh salmon at a reasonable price, we might be suspicious about where it had come from. Let us take somebody like yourself, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If I were to offer you a fresh salmon, you might accept it from me in all innocence. Under clause 71, it would be possible for you to be convicted of possessing an illegally taken salmon on the ground that you ought to have suspected that I was dealing in poached salmon.

There may be grounds for allowing courts to prosecute in such circumstances, and to crack down on some particularly heinous crime such as drug trafficking, but such a breach of an important principle of Scots law cannot be justified to convict people who did not know that they were doing anything wrong, just to protect salmon. As the hon. Member for Dundee, East said, this can lead to heavy fines, terms of imprisonment and criminal records hanging over people for the rest of their lives. It is wrong that Parliament should allow courts to convict in such circumstances, and the Minister must take these points on board.

Mr. Beith: With a Scottish solicitor and a Scottish advocate sitting beside me on the Liberal Bench, I shall concentrate my remarks on the English amendment of the two standing in my name. Amendment No. 20 is worded in almost the same way as the other two amendments. They address the terms by which someone can be convicted, namely, if that a relevant offence has been committed. I argue that there should be grounds for a person to believe that an offence has been committed. The words that I have quoted have to be seen in conjunction with subsection (3) of clause 31 which states:

"it would be reasonable for him to suspect"

"It shall be immaterial for the purposes of subsection (1) above that a person's belief or the grounds for suspicion—" that is, the grounds that he ought to have had—

"relate neither specifically to a particular offence that has been committed nor exclusively to a relevant offence or to relevant offences;"

The only qualification that the clause continues to offer is that "it shall be a defence in proceedings . . . to show that no relevant offence had in fact been committed in relation to the salmon in question."

If a person can prove that the salmon had not been poached he has demonstrated his innocence by disproving the assumptions of guilt which the two parts of the clause taken together impute.

In Committee we were regaled at length by the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) about the "poor wee crofter woman." She became a favoured figure on the Committee. A salmon was placed at her door and she came forthwith to the conclusion that it was a gift from God. It was indeed such a gift. Other agents may have participated in this heavenly donation but it was a gift from God. The woman was guilty because it would have been reasonable for her to suspect that the person who laid the salmon at her door would have come to the front door and knocked and charged her for it had he been a legitimate salmon trader who had obtained the salmon legally. The poor crofter woman has to be found guilty because it would have been reasonable for her to suspect that a relevant offence had been committed.

We must, however, consider other characters as well as the crofter woman. Let us suppose that the Minister had bought a raffle ticket for a worthy cause and that the first prize was a fresh salmon. Suppose the fresh salmon was presented to him as a result of his success in the raffle. However, it would have been reasonable for him to suspect that a relevant offence had been committed in relation to that salmon because it was known that poaching took place in the locality in which the raffle ticket was bought, and it was known that among the supporters of the worthy cause there were people who, at some time, had been found guilty of poaching. It could be argued that it was reasonable for the Minister, in those circumstances, to have suspected that a relevant offence had been committed.

Dr. Godman: As the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) is something of a legal expert, I hope that he can answer a question that is puzzling me. If the "wee wifey" had been presented with a salmon that had been gutted — or headed as it is called — and filleted, would she then have faced criminal charges?

Mr. Beith: Yes; it would have made no difference. She would have been presented with a salmon even though some bits were missing from it. No doubt my hon. Friends would be able to sustain a case for days, nay weeks, on the question of whether a gutted salmon was a whole salmon or whether a half or a third of a salmon was a salmon. Let me disclaim any suggestion that I am a legal expert. Far from it. If I were, I would be as well endowed as some of my hon. Friends who have pursued the law to such lengths.

There is obviously endless scope for legal argument. However, an individual has the imputation of guilt posed against him because it would have been reasonable for him to suspect that an offence had been committed. He may have had no such suspicion in his mind. He may be an unsuspecting soul and he may not have drawn the conclusions which the court thinks that he ought to have drawn from circumstances in his area. He may not be able to disprove the prosecution case by demostrating that he had no such belief. The absence of that belief is not a defence. He must prove that it would not even have been reasonable for him to suspect.

This seems to place the onus of proof of innocence on the individual in a quite unreasonable way. It is a way of framing the law that has not been entertained in respect of far more serious offences involving far greater dangers. There are well-known difficulties about obtaining prosecutions for salmon offences, but they have not stopped a great many people from being successfully prosecuted in the courts in my constituency and in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood). There have been many prosecutions of late.

Even if there are difficulties, we must pause and think before writing into the law this presumption of guilt which has not been found necessary in relation to much more serious offences.

Mr. John MacKay: Let me first, Mr. Deputy Speaker, set your mind at rest in case the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) presents you with a salmon. I think you would have a very reasonable defence if you said that the hon. Gentleman was a large estate owner on the banks of the River Tweed. Therefore, if he does present you with a salmon you can take it without much fear — [Interruption.] My right hon. friend the Minister of State tells me that he thinks he will take the risk of the raffle prize.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): No doubt, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you did have knowledge. At least you have now been told that the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) is a large riparian owner. What if someone did not know that? What situation would he be in?

Mr. MacKay: I do not want to go into all the details, but I just gave Mr. Deputy Speaker the defence that he would have in these circumstances. One must look to the particular circumstance.

One of the Bill's major aims is to provide effective measures against the poaching, taking, selling and distribution of illegal salmon. A lot of pressure from all the outside bodies has been on us to strengthen the law. In fact, many people do not think that the Government have gone nearly far enough, but I fully appreciate that if I had gone that far in relation to the onus of proof, some of the points made by hon. Members would be valid. That is why I have not gone as far as many other people wished me to go.

What I have done is reasonable and precedented. In Scotland the alternative of proving suspicious circumstances is contained in section 7 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries (Protection) (Scotland) Act 1951. For example, a court may convict for an offence under section 15 or sections 18 to 24 of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act 1868 on the evidence of one witness. The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) wanted precedents, and I would have thought that those were good ones. The position is maintained in clause 29. There is also section 7 of the 1951 Act and section 25 of the Deer (Scotland) Act 1959.

[Mr. MacKay]

In all those areas, as in this one, the nature of the offences creates difficulties for enforcement officers and in my mind justifies the relaxation of the requirement for corroborative evidence. That was part and parcel of a long discussion that we had in Committee, when hon. Members put their points, and in each case their points were defeated when pressed to a Division.

Mr. Wilson: The precedents that the Minister has given come from salmon and game laws. What other precedents can he find in the general criminal law? Why should we relax these provisions for poachers and those in possession of salmon when we are not prepared to do so in cases of murder, rape and so on?

Mr. MacKay: The hon. Gentleman should talk to some of the people who are interested in the conservation of salmon and the prevention of poaching. He will then realise that many of the offences take place at the back of beyond, at night and in circumstances where life is not easy for the bailiffs and police.

The prosecutor must show that the accused believed that the salmon in his possession had been taken illegally, by an admission of guilt by the accused. It has been argued that that will be knocked out by one of the amendments. Alternatively, the prosecutor may need evidence to show that the circumstances in which the accused had salmon in his possession were such that he ought to have suspected that the salmon had been illegally taken.

I am merely trying to explain what the words mean. We had long debates in Committee on this matter and, frankly, I believe that enforcement is a genuine problem. Opposition Members have said how keen they are to conserve salmon, and how keen they are to eliminate poaching, yet when it comes to doing something about it they wish to leave the law as powerless as it is at present.

Mr. Home Robertson rose——

Mr. MacKay: We believe that enforcement is a great problem.

Mr. Home Robertson: The Minister is right in saying that attempting to prosecute people is difficult in these circumstances. Surely he will acknowledge that there is an even greater problem in prosecuting serious crimes, such as drug trafficking. Do the Government intend to introduce similar draconian measures for other offences?

Mr. MacKay: The hon. Gentleman should stick to what we are discussing—salmon and the associated problems.

All the amendments under discussion would weaken the clause. They would weaken the stand that we are taking against poachers and other illegal fishermen. I believe that the courts will look sensibly at the evidence —after all, that is their job—and judge. The clause will improve and strengthen the law. Those who wish to water it down and who offer no alternatives for reforming the law are hypocritical about salmon conservation and protection. I hope that they will have the decency to keep their mouths shut when it comes to preventing poaching and preserving salmon.

Mr. Wallace: I have listened with interest and care to the Minister's point that the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) is known—to Members of this House—to be a riparian land owner. I am in no way casting blame in his direction because of that fact.

If the hon. Member for East Lothian presented me with a salmon there would be no reasonable grounds to suppose that it was an illegal salmon. On the other hand, if an innocent member of the public were presented with a free salmon from a Labour Member he would never dream for one moment that that hon. Member was a large landowner on the banks of the Tweed. In such circumstances it may be said that he had reasonable grounds to suspect that the salmon was illegal.

My hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) gave the example of a prize-winning raffle ticket. The Minister dismissed that suggestion, but a court might decide that such a prize fell within the ambit of this clause. It is all very well for us to know what we do not mean by legislation but unless that is stated on the statute book the court will pay no regard to it.

The courts would not be aware that the raffle ticket scenario was laughed out of the House. The wording of the statute may allow the courts to put any construction on a case. When we create offences, it is incumbent on the House to make sure that they are defined strictly to ensure that wider interpretation is not possible. It is one of the cardinal principles of criminal law that the citizen accused should know, with some precision, what does and does not constitute an offence. As it stands, the clause is too wide. The amendment limits it and makes it more precise.

Corroboration is a very important part of the law of Scotland. It is an important evidential requirement—not on every point but on the cardinal points that constitute the crime. The Minister has given some precedents. However, the law of corroboration has been built up over many centuries and is a fundamental part of Scottish law.

It is all very well for the Minister to say that today we are discussing salmon, not drugs, but it is not unfair to make that comparison. He said that one must remember the difficulties that have to be faced when trying to prove a crime and obtain a conviction. However, the smuggling of drugs does not take place in the open. Those who are trying to put an end to the smuggling of drugs are faced with problems when trying to obtain proof. Scottish policemen travel around in twos, so why should bailiffs not go around in twos if that is a corroboration requirement of Scottish law?

When precedents are set we are treading on dangerous ground. The Minister is a great person for precedents. Those hon. Members who have sat on other Committees with him know that when a clause is challenged as a novel departure he will reel off precedents. Tonight we are providing yet another precedent. If he wants to use it in connection with other parts of the law of Scotland to erode the evidential law of corroboration that has been built up over many years, he will cite it as a precedent. By that means, bit by bit, eventually we shall find that the bulwarks of Scottish law that are there for a very good reason have been slowly eroded away.

The Minister has not provided us with a convincing reason why offences relating to salmon should be treated in a different way from more serious crimes, and if the mover of the amendment thinks fit to press it to a Division I shall be prepared to support him.

Mr. Wilson: I have heard some weak arguments from the Dispatch Box over the years, but this is one of the weakest. But it is not the weakness of the argument to which I object; it is its sheer immorality.

To return to the absence of precedent, the Minister was unable to find any precedent outside the game and fishing laws of the 19th century. He had the utter gall to bring that to our attention, as though that were a justification in itself. I have already said that this is bad law and that it is completely at variance with the rest of the law of Scotland, in terms of evidential requirements.

The Minister would fit more happily into the role of a prosecutor than into the role of ensuring that justice is done in Scottish courts. It is axiomatic that 10 guilty men should go unpunished rather than that one innocent man should be wrongfully convicted. If the Minister had kept that as his objective, he would not have strayed from the path.

The attitude adopted by the Minister and the Government is horrifying. However, the Conservative party has always been the party of landed interests. When it comes to the rights of the citizen and the estate landlord, we know on whose side it will come down. I wish, therefore, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to put amendment No. 21 to the vote.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The debate has taken place on amendment No. 18. If the hon. Gentleman would prefer there to be a vote on amendment No. 21, that would be in order. In that case, does he wish to withdraw amendment No. 18?

Mr. Wilson: I beg to ask leave to withdraw amendment No. 18.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Home Robertson: I beg to move amendment No. 22, in page 21, line 5, leave out paragraph (b).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It will be convenient to discuss at the same time Government amendment No. 23.

Mr. Home Robertson: When considering amendment No. 16 we debated the question of the power to enter and search private dwellings in relation to dealer licensing. We now come to the same point in relation to powers of search and entry without a warrant to secure evidence of possession of poached salmon.

Parliament should think carefully before allowing bailiffs or constables to gain entry to people's property without a warrant. There is concern about the possible shortcomings of bailiffs—an issue that we have already discussed. I am not the only one to suggest that there should be better provision governing the quality, vetting and training of bailiffs. Many hon. Members have received representations from the superintendent of the Forth District Salmon Fishery Board. Serious misgivings have been expressed, by people experienced in these matters, about the qualifications of bailiffs.

There may be a case for this type of infringement of civil liberties — letting bailiffs or constables enter people's dwelling houses—to make it easier to deal with serious crime, but I have grave doubts whether that can be justified in the quest for evidence of salmon poaching.

It has been said that an Englishman's home is his castle. I suggest that Scots also have rights in their own homes, including the right to protection against over-zealous bailiffs kicking people's doors down to search for contraband salmon. I therefore welcome the Government's concession in amendment No. 23, which will at least exclude people's dwelling houses and gardens from this right to enter and search without a warrant. The Minister should be ashamed of himself for ever having suggested that such powers should be included in the Bill in the first place. But we are grateful to him for listening for once to our arguments in Committee.

Mr. John MacKay: The point that the hon. Member makes was discussed at length in Committee. Having given careful thought to the matter, I have tabled amendment No. 23. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw his amendment and that the House will accept mine.

Mr. Home Robertson: I had intended to make that clear. In view of the terms of the Minister's amendment, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 30

Dealer licensing in England and Wales

Mr. Rowlands: I beg to move amendment No. 24, in page 25, line 30, leave out 'may' and insert

'shall, within six months after the coming into force of this section of this Act'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I suggest that it would be convenient for the House to discuss at the same time the following amendments: No. 25, in page 25, line 30, after 'may' insert

'after consulting representatives of such interests as appear to him to be affected'.

No. 26, in page 25, line 35, leave out

'such person as may be so specified' and insert 'a water authority'.

No. 27, in page 26, line 15, at end insert 'by a water authority'.

Mr. Rowlands: The amendment stands in the names of a large number of hon. Members, including many who represent Welsh constituencies. It has been an advantage to have had a Scottish period, so to speak, in debating the amendments; we began with Welsh affairs and now we return to those matters. In the interim, those of us who represent Welsh constituencies have had time to reflect on the Minister's arguments in rejecting our new clauses 4, 5 and 6.

The Minister spoke of what he regarded as a series of practical problems against tagging. In his view, licensed dealers will help conservation. The Minister clearly reached that view as he proceeded along the road to conversion. We, too, believe in salvation, and if licensed dealing is the salvation of the nation's salmon stocks, that salvation should come as quickly as possible, and the amendment would ensure that the scheme commenced within six months. Perhaps we should adopt the form of words that the Minister used earlier and say that the scheme should begin "prior to the next season". To what time scale is he working for the introduction of the licensed dealer system?

Secondly, who will be responsible for the licensing? The amendment recommends that the responsibility should lie with the water authorities for England and Wales, and it would not make much sense for a Welsh local authority to be the licensing or enforcement authority. Bearing in mind the experience, professionalism and knowledge of the water authorities, I hope that the Minister will accept the principle of the amendment. Surely it would be unimaginable to vest responsibility for such a licensing system in a Welsh district authority or county council. Counties and districts are not uneager to accept powers in our communities, but in this instance I do not think that they would contend that they would be the appropriate bodies to accept the licensing responsibility. I speak chiefly for the Principality, and I believe that the Welsh water authority would be the obvious body to undertake licensing and enforcement responsibilities.

I should like to know how the proposed system will be financed. What sort of expenditure is envisaged or expected following the introduction of the licensing system? I hope that the Minister will tell us rather more of the Department's thinking about the system of payment apart from enforcement, licensing and the proposed timescale.

The Minister has argued that the tagging system that we propose would involve many practical difficulties. We are discussing anti-poaching measures that are vital to conservation, and any new system will be difficult to implement. We know the sophistication, scale and character of poaching, and when I listened to the Minister I thought that an accommodation could be reached by substituting "licensed dealing" for "tagging". In any event, how will a licensed dealer identify whether the fish that he is being sold has been caught legally or illegally? That is a simple question and I hope that the Minister will respond with a simple answer. Tagging offers at least a possibility or probability of some identification of legality or legitimacy of the catch. Will the dealer be expected to ask whether the seller is an authorised dealer? What sort of documentation will a seller have to present?

Mr. Onslow rose——

Mr. Rowlands: We support the licensed dealer system and we are grateful that the system will apply in England and Wales. The Bill would be entirely Scottish if that were not the position. I have no reason to wish to undermine confidence in the licensed dealer system. However, as the Minister has argued strenuously against the scheme that we proposed, which was complementary to licensed dealing, we are entitled to pose a series of genuine queries and questions on behalf of the many anglers and others who are interested in the conservation of salmon in the Principality.

Mr. Onslow: It would be helpful to have an answer to another question. Let us suppose that someone is fortunate enough to catch a big salmon in a Welsh river, he brings it to London and sells it to a restaurant in the Kings road. Must he have a licence to buy and sell salmon? Where will the restaurant get its licence and how will the proceeds go back to where they belong — the water authority?

12.15 am

Mr. Rowlands: I look forward to an answer to that question.

When we press the Minister it is not in a spirit of trying to undermine the proposed system. We want to make it work. I believe that the water authority will be able to make it work. We want a practical answer to the question. This is our salvation. Let us operate the system as quickly as possible.

Mr. Beith: I am in favour of the extension of dealer licensing to England and Wales. I understand why in July the Minister was unable to say in Committee who would operate the system in England and Wales and why he was unable to put the details in the Bill as they were set out for Scotland. For Scotland the powers are given to local authorities under existing legislation.

It is not satisfactory, however, that at this stage we still do not know to whom the powers are to be entrusted. One of the amendments argues that the powers should be given specifically to the water authorities. I believe that the water authorities should have the powers, but that would not remain my view if the water authorities were privatised. I am relieved that the Government have had to abandon their intention to privatise the water authorities. If they were privatised they would not be appropriate bodies to operate the dealer licensing scheme, any more than some of the other functions ascribed to them under the Bill which involve a public body regulating who shall be allowed to carry out certain activities. That is not a suitable power for a private organisation.

The Minister should by now be able to say to which public body these functions are to be given. Because he has been unable to decide, the Bill contains enabling provisions which give him the opportunity to implement his decision later. He is given wide powers. Partly because of that I tabled an amendment to force him to consult relevant interests. But my concern goes wider than consultation. An amendment in the next group involves criminal offences.

I hope that the Minister can tell us who will carry out the dealer licensing and how quickly the scheme can be introduced.

Mr. Gummer: The water authorities will be asked to carry out these requirements. I hope that the House will not find it necessary to press the amendment to that effect because if at some future time the constitution of the water authorities becomes different, or if it is more sensible that some other body be involved, I should not like to have to change primary legislation. It is more sensible to leave matters as they are, but the House has my assurnace that the water authorities will have the powers.

The cost of the scheme will be paid for by the water authorities from their resources. They will levy licences and the money so raised will help pay for the scheme.

Other matters have to be sorted out and we shall look at the issues raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow). It would be wrong for me to hide from him the fact that in our discussions we shall have to accept that one problem with the water authorities carrying out the responsibilities is that some have a much greater interest in the matter than others. I know that the authorities are keen to find an appropriate system.

My answer to the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) is that I hope very much that there will be no delay in the implementation of the dealer licensing scheme. I am committed to it, I was happy to insist on its extension to England and Wales and I was pleased that my colleagues in the Welsh Office agreed to the change. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman has my personal support for the speediest possible introduction of the new scheme.

However, I ask the hon. Gentleman to listen to those who say that there are a number of problems about which we shall need to have considerable discussions. I ask him not to press the argument that we should be bound to a date, because a date would be necessary only if we were unwilling to move as fast as we can and we are willing to move as fast as possible. However, we must make sure that the system will work and, as the hon. Gentleman said, it is not always easy to ensure that. I do not want a system that falls down because we have not prepared it properly. After all, we are giving licences to people who have not hitherto had to have licences, sometimes for anything.

That is the wrong time of night to go through the various ways in which the scheme will be able to be operated satisfactorily, but a licensee will have to ask the sort of questions that will protect him from the change in the law that provides that he can be found guilty if it would have been reasonable for him to believe that salmon that he was buying had been illegally taken.

To take the example quoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Woking, the Kings road restaurateur offered a good fat salmon from Wales will have to satisfy himself that the salmon had been properly caught and had not been taken illegally. There will be a number of ways in which he can do that and one will be to satisfy himself that the man had the right to take the salmon. If he is knowledgeable about salmon and there are gill marks on the fish that lead him to believe that it was taken improperly, he will have to take account of that. He will keep records and they could be checked by the water authorities.

I assure the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney that we are making every effort——

Mr. Onslow: Will my right hon. Friend deal with the linked point of how the Thames water authority, which will presumably have sold the dealer's licence to the Kings road restaurant, will be made to remit the proceeds to the Welsh water authority which would have been responsible for producing the salmon?

Mr. Gummer: We shall be discussing that issue with the water authorities which have already discussed it among themselves because they have problems of enforcement. They have pooling arrangements in other areas and no doubt they will be considering such an arrangement in this area.

I assure hon. Members that we intend to get the new system into operation as rapidly as possible. Indeed, we must do so. I have given a number of assurances and the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney is right to say that if we cannot get the system into operation rapidly enough everything else will fall.

Mr. Rowlands: I am grateful to the Minister for his response to our amendments. I am more than happy to accept his personal assurances. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Beith: I beg to move amendment No. 28, in page 26, line 33, at end insert—

'(7) A person guilty of an offence under any Order made under this section shall be liable—

(a) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months or to a fine not exceeding the statutory minimum or to both;

(b) on conviction on indictment, to an imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years or to a fine or to both.'.

One of the consequences of the wide powers given to the Minister in clause 30 is that he can "create criminal offences consisting in the contravention of, or failure to comply with, provisions made under this section".

I do not believe that Ministers should be given the power to create criminal offences by statutory instrument. Such offences should be created by primary legislation. Whatever extenuating circumstances one can produce in any given case, it is bad practice for the House to make criminal offences by statutory instrument. That is why I have tabled an amendment which tries to specify one aspect of the matter—what the punishments for these criminal offences could be.

One of the consequential provisions that the Minister has power to put into effect is to decide what the punishment should be. He has tremendous scope and anything from a small fine to the death penalty seems to be within the range of possibilities open to him. When he has finally made his decision, it comes before the House in a statutory instrument that cannot be amended. All that the House can do is vote to approve or disapprove of it. No other choice is available to the House and that is not a satisfactory way in which to create criminal law or to decide upon penalties. Despite the reasons that can be advanced for doing it in this case, the House should protest whenever it is attempted. My amendment is designed to limit the Minister's ability so to legislate because it is an improper way to create criminal law.

Mr. Gummer: The kind of amounts and the matters that the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) has put forward are far from the sort of order one is thinking about. I ask him to accept that when one is trying to work out a new system like this in response to the pressures of the Committee, it must be right to try to fix the amounts after the system has been produced. He is right to say that it will have to be presented to the House. Hon. Members can refuse to accept the order and it is unamendable. He is right about those things, but given the arguments that we have heard and the precedents and other examples in the Bill, it is difficult to say that this power is likely to be used in any extraordinary way.

I promise the hon. Gentleman that we will not reintroduce the death penalty for this issue. It is rather overdoing it to suggest that the Executive will suddenly get their heads down and do something appalling. That will not happen. To give us no opportunity to change the punishments when the value of money or the situation changes considerably will only take us back to the point where some of the things that we are amending this time have not been amended since 1862. That is a reasonable argument and I hope that the House will accept it.

Mr. Beith: There is now a system of scale fines which gets over the difficulty of inflation, making fines unnecessary. The principle remains that these offences should be created not by statutory instrument but by primary legislation.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 31

HANDLING SALMON IN SUSPICIOUS CIRCUMSTANCES

Mr. Randall: I beg to move amendment No. 29, in page 26, line 34, leave out 'subsections (3) and (4)' and insert 'subsection (4)'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 31, in page 27, line 4, leave out subsection (3).

No. 32, in page 27, line 7, leave out from 'committed' to 'but' in line 8.

Mr. Randall: Amendment No. 31 is about the deletion of subsection (3) and amendment No. 29 is a minor consequential amendment arising from that deletion.

Many of the arguments surrounding this amendment have been expressed in relation to other amendments and clauses. The purpose of the amendment is to protect innocent people who did not realise that they were breaking the law by handling salmon. We must have effective protection to overcome the abuse of poaching. I think everybody on the Committee accepted that there would have to be effective measures.

I am in a dilemma. On the one hand, we need tough and effective legislation to make sure that abuse is properly dealt with. On the other hand, this same legislation, because it is comprehensive and strong, creates the risk of convicting somebody who did not know that he was breaking the law. It could be costly in human terms if we were to convict someone who genuinely did not realise that he was breaking the law. Hon. Members have a duty to protect people against such an error. The Bill makes it too easy to convict an innocent person who genuinely did not realise that he was handling illegally obtained fish.

We need tough legislation because we are dealing with a tough problem. However, it is important to recognise that there is an ethical argument that hon. Members must address. That is why we should delete subsection (3).

12.30 am

Mr. Beith: I shall not repeat the arguments about burden of proof that we advanced earlier—the essential principle is the same. During that debate I referred—slightly ahead of myself—to subsection (3). I must ask the Minister what it means. It appears to mean that it is not possible for a person to advance in his own defence that there were no grounds for believing that the person who had sold him the salmon had committed an offence or for believing that anyone had poached any salmon in the area where he bought his salmon. That is all immaterial—he can still be convicted on the basis that he should have had reason to believe that someone, some time, might have poached salmon and that that might be the salmon that had fallen into his hands.

It appears that it is not possible for that person to argue in his defence that, as far as he knew, no one in the locality had committed any offence and that no specific offence had occurred. I cannot think of what else the subsection could mean. Can the Minister tell the House what he thinks it means?

Mr. Gummer: We covered this matter closely in Committee and have tonight returned to the same arguments. At this late hour I shall not go into them in detail because it would be wrong to repeat what we have said so often.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) rather uncharacteristically said on the one hand that he wanted something, but on the other that he was not prepared to pay the price for it.

Mr. Randall: It is a dilemma.

Mr. Gummer: It may be a dilemma, but we cannot solve it by writing into the Bill the action that must be taken and then removing the ability to take that action. That would be the purpose of the amendment—we would have the offence, because that is what is needed, but would take away the right to prosecute.

Having agonised over creating an offence in a very careful way that does not go so far as to reverse the burden of proof but makes it possible to gain convictions in very difficult areas, it would be wrong for us to negative that by making the changes proposed in the amendment.

The circumstances suggested by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) are very wide of the mark. We have tried to create an offence that would allow us to secure convictions in very difficult circumstances. By its very nature, the sort of evidence that we would like to have of a fish being pulled out of a river, a man standing there with the bailiff beside him and two independent witnesses, does not occur. We must decide how to have an effective conservation policy that means effective enforcement. If we make the changes suggested, they will negative the effectiveness of the creation of an offence.

We have been through a series of debates and this matter has gone backwards and forwards in Committee. On every occasion the Committee decided that it would be right to retain the offence without the changes of this and other kinds that have been put forward by the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) and his hon. Friends.

Mr. Beith: Will the Minister simply answer the question? What does subsection (3) mean and what would be wrong with the Bill if it were taken out?

Mr. Gummer: The purpose is clear. It is to ensure that the prosecution does not have to show that the buyer believed or suspected that a particular offence had been committed but that, in the circumstances, it would be reasonable for him to think that an offence had been committed. The effect in law is seriously different. In one circumstance it would be almost impossible to prove guilt in cases where there has been an offence and where everybody knows that the person who bought the salmon knew there had been an offence. That is why we have changed it. I know that the hon. Gentleman does not see the difference. I have tried to explain it in various ways. I believe that most people understand the distinction and that is why on every occasion that this was put to the vote the Committee showed that it supported the balanced view which the Government were putting forward.

Amendment negatived.

Introduction of fish into fish farms without consent

Amendment made: No 33, in page 28, line 27, leave out from first 'or' to second 'the' in line 29 and insert

'the inland water is one which consists exclusively of, or part of, a fish farm and which, if it discharges into another inland water, does so only through a conduit constructed or adapted for the purpose.

In this section 'fish farm' has the same meaning as in'.
—[Mr. Gummer.]

Clause 36

Byelaws and Sea Fisheries Regulation Act 1966

Mr. Onslow: I beg to move amendment No. 36, in page 30, line 11, leave out 'Subject to subsection (3) below,'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider the following amendments: No. 37, in page 30, line 17, at end insert 'and must be exercised if the water auhority whose area for the purposes of functions relating to fisheries includes the whole or any part of the committee's sea fishery district have requested that committee so to do'.

No. 38, in page 30, line 28, leave out '(1) or'.

No. 39, in page 30, line 32, at end insert

'or, such consent having been withheld, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, shall have given his consent.'.

Government amendment No. 40.

Mr. Onslow: My right hon. Friend the Minister will remember that we established in Committee that where their spheres of responsibility meet in a number of important estuarial and coastal waters, the interests of the water authorities and the fisheries committees do not always coincide. It is not the duty of the fisheries committees to promote salmon conservation. I have no wish to stir the pot further tonight. My amendment is simply designed to ensure that fisheries committees do not obstruct salmon conservation by refusing to make the bye-laws that are required for that purpose and so leaving unscrupulous sea fishermen free to catch salmon illegally under the cover of fishing for white fish.

The real answer is to have an integrated policy for the management of in-shore fisheries. We do not have it. If my right hon. Friend can show me that he has a better method of achieving progress towards that end than my amendment I shall be happy to withdraw it. However, I should like to hear what he has to say.

Mr. Beith: I supported the hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) in Committee on this point. However, the Northumberland Sea Fisheries Committee says that it does not agree. It takes the view that the amendment proposed would "remove any element of discretion . . . from the Sea Fisheries Committee inconsistent with and repugnant to the whole concept of the giving by Parliament to Sea Fisheries Committees of powers to make bye-laws."

The view I took in Committee, and the view I still hold, is that where there is an overlapping interest between the fisheries committee and the water authority, cases could arise in which one or other body was not having proper regard to the interests of salmon conservation. It could work either way, which is why my amendment No. 39 is in the same group. That amendment allows the fisheries committees to appeal to the Minister if they have met with objections from the water authority. That quid pro quo might make the proposal of the hon. Member for Woking a little more acceptable. The Minister should consider that if one of the bodies refuses to use the powers available or tries to prevent the powers from being properly used there should be some recourse for them.

Sir Michael Shaw (Scarborough): I realise that there have been considerable debates on this subject. I have received a letter from the North-Eastern Sea Fisheries Committee, and I have talked the matter over with the chairman of that committee. There is a difficulty, but I do not agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow). What we have seen in the way of conservation and protection of the sea fish industry has not convinced me that on this issue the water authorities know better than the local fisheries committees — certainly not in the area that I represent.

[Sir Michael Shaw]

The Bill goes a long way towards ensuring that the fisheries committees cannot produce byelaws unless the local water authority gives its consent. To go further and insist that the local fisheries committees should carry out instructions from the water authority would be unwise. The fisheries committees should be encouraged in the task of conserving salmon in the sea. They are much better qualified to do so, and in many cases the water authorities are concerned with inland waterways rather than with the sea. The fisheries committees would do a far better job if they had complete control of dealing with poaching.

Under another part of the Bill, an advisory committee will look into the matter again, and I hope that it will be looked at with a view to seeing whether the fisheries committees might, in the end, be in charge of this important aspect of conservation.

Mr. Rowlands: It is nice to take off one's tribal hat, and I can do so in this case because there is no such Welsh point. We do not have the problem of conflict of interest, which the amendment seeks to get round, and there is no doubt that there will be a conflict of interest. The hon. Member for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw) spoke about the fisheries committees being enthusiastic about salmon conservation, but the people they represent may not be interested in such an aspect. It is a worry of water authorities that the committees will do nothing to promote the byelaws.

The future of conservation lies in enforcement, as has already been said, and in the need for a proper bailiff system. What manpower do the fisheries committees have to enforce such byelaws? The water authorities have a bailiff system, which we have said we should strengthen and improve, but what sort of manpower will the committees invoke to enforce the agreed byelaws? There is a problem, and the water authorities have every right to say that they are concerned and worried that such byelaws will not be promoted, and will not be properly policed and supervised if they are. The water authorities will have as much interest as the fisheries committees in committing themselves to that task, and so should have the manpower to do it. The hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) has put a valid point, and I shall support his amendment.

Mr. Randall: Like other hon. Members, I have a letter from the Northumberland Sea Fisheries Committee, but it was passed to me by my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Brown). The committee has great reservations about the two amendments tabled by the hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow), particularly amendment No. 36. It feels that, where there is a conflict between the fisheries committees and the water authorities, the Minister should be able to resolve that conflict. The clerk of the committee gave as an example the fixed engines which the committee is desperately anxious to keep, but under this arrangement the water authority could impose its veto and prevent it from doing so. The Northumberland Sea Fisheries committee also made a strong criticism of amendment No. 37. The committee believes that the earlier decisions of Parliament to give powers to the sea fisheries committees to create byelaws would be undermined because water authority permission would have to be sought. I thought that it would be right to put those two points on to the record.

Mr. John Townend: I should like to add my support to my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw). There is great concern among the fishing industry in Bridlington at the possible reduction in the power of the sea fisheries committee. I suggest that my right hon. Friend the Minister does not accept the amendment.

Mr. Gummer: It is obvious from the debate that there is a difference of opinion between two perfectly reasonably constituted bodies. We cannot resolve that problem by granting the kind of powers presented in the amendment. It is increasingly important for the two bodies to work closely together. I should reassure my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) that that is precisely what is happening. The intention of amendment No. 40 is to increase the powers of the sea fisheries committees so that they can do more effectively what they have been excluded from doing. The sea fisheries committees, even when they so wished, were specifically excluded from dealing with salmon and sea trout. Amendment No. 40 will correct that position and I hope will grant the committees that power.

Sea fisheries committees differ, so I cannot give a general statement of their resources. However, many committees have considerable resources for dealing with the regulation of matters apart from their main business which is, of course, the regulation of sea fisheries. Those resources can also be applied, and would be appropriate to be applied, to enforcing the byelaws that we are considering now.

I understand the worry expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Woking about the overlap. However, I do not think that that overlap can be overcome by creating unwilling partners. We must have willing partners. My view which has been supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) and my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw) is that in many cases the sea fisheries committees and the water authorities are working more closely and effectively together. We must encourage that rather than get the whole process off to a bad start by changing the position and make the committees feel that powers given to them by Parliament were now going to be downgraded in that area.

If we find in the light of experience that my hon. Friend the Member for Woking has been right and that I have been wrong, we will reconsider the matter, as my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough suggested. However, the outcome may not be as he wished.

Mr. Onslow: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Order for Third Reading read.—

[Queen's consent, on behalf of the Crown, signified.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

12.50 am

Mr. John Townend: I do not wish to detain the House for long at this time of night, but I would like to put it on record that the Bill, as finally amended, will cause some concern to the fishing industry in Bridlington, particularly to the fishermen who operate fixed nets.

There is a feeling that too much power has been given to the water authorities. For example, clause 36 states that:

"A local fisheries committee shall not make byelaws for any purpose mentioned in subsection (1) and (2) above unless the water authority . . . have consented to byelaws being made".

Clause 32 extends the controls to include not only fixed nets for salmon fishing but also for other fishing in tidal waters. This gives the water authority power to control the fishing of cod and sole by fixed nets. I am not sure whether that was the original intention. This is a vital part of the livelihood of the coble owners in Bridlington and it would mean that the water authority, if so inclined, could restrict that type of fishing.

I am not saying that the water authority would take that action, but I am afraid that from past experience the Bridlington fishermen have very little confidence that the Yorkshire authority would pay adequate regard to the interests of the commercial fishermen.

Clause 35 also introduces a further restriction on the fixed net fishermen — that whenever a salmon or sea trout net is hauled the licensee must be present. While this might be acceptable for drift nets, it will cause great difficulty for the fixed netsmen who set T and J nets which are not nearly as profitable as drift nets. It will make it virtually impossible for them to continue other fishing operations, such as potting, yet these other activities are essential to sustain a living, particularly in the summer months.

There is a strong argument for exempting T and J nets from the regulations but that has not been accepted by the Government, even though only 5 per cent. of the catch is salmon. The remainder is salmon trout and there are adequate stocks in the North sea. There is a feeling in Bridlington that the fishermen's interests have been sacrificed to the salmon lobby, which includes many prominent members of the other place from where the Bill originated.

I hope that my right hon. Friend is aware of these reservations among the fishing community and that, having listened carefully, he will be able to assure our fishermen that their fears are unlikely to be fulfilled.

Mr. Home Robertson: That was a fascinating Second Reading speech. It may read well in the local press in the Bridlington area, but the hon. Gentleman's misgivings and remarks would have been slightly more convincing had he raised them earlier. If he is that unhappy about some of the clauses, I wonder why he did not vote against them.

The Opposition see the Bill as a sad waste of a potentially valuable opportunity to legislate for the future of salmon and freshwater fisheries. We should like to have seen a serious attempt to restructure the administration of these fisheries in a manner that would have achieved the respect of all interested parties. We should like to have seen a sensibly constituted set of salmon fishery boards with the authority and resources to protect and develop salmon fishing in the coming years and, indeed, to conserve stocks. I fear that the Bill fails to measure up to those objectives. It clings to the principle of proprietorial privilege and authority in the constitution of the boards. I suppose that is precisely what one ought to expect from any Tory Government. I was glad to hear the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) echo that sentiment.

The Bill also gives some unwarranted powers to the boards and their bailiffs which could lead to even more conflict and even less respect for the law on our rivers and lochs. However, we support the principle of dealer licensing and live in hope that the standing advisory committee on salmon conservation will get the personnel, resources and attention that it deserves. When in due course they are appointed by the Ministry, we wish Professor Dunnet and his colleagues well in their deliberations.

[Mr. Home Robertson]

The dealer licensing scheme and the advisory committee are two potentially useful factors. We welcome those redeeming features in an otherwise sad piece of legislation.

Mr. Beith: I share some of the misgivings of the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend), but I agree that he should have expressed them at an earlier stage in our proceedings. He could have helped in getting some of the clauses changed and could have tabled some amendments for the Report stage of the Bill. Unfortunately, he has already left the Chamber.

With regard to the Bill, I take a more sanguine view than does the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson). There is much good in the Bill and it contains a number of useful provisions. I regret the fact that much of it is concerned with enabling powers and that Ministers will be left to decide, by order, important questions.

It is good that the Minister has ensured a balance between the interests of those who draw their livelihoods from salmon and conservation fishing. He has resisted the attempts of a few to hijack the Bill for a vindictive attack on one group of fishermen and their attempts to deprive these fishermen of their livelihoods. I appreciate the responsible action of the Minister.

Mr. MacKay: This is an important Bill on an important subject. It will be of great benefit to the conservation of salmon species and will benefit future salmon angling.

We have attempted to keep a balance between netting and angling and that is right and proper. I assure the House that my right hon. Friend and I will try, as quickly as possible, to implement the Bill so that it can soon benefit salmon fishing. I indulge in a little salmon angling and I look forward to the benefits which will accrue to me and to other anglers in the years ahead.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read the Third time and passed, with amendments.

Diabetics (Equipment)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Sainsbury.]

12.56 am

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I now turn to a different subject. I must declare an interest in this subject as I am the parent of a diabetic child. I am in the fortunate position, like other hon. Members of the House who have diabetic children, that I can afford to buy the supplies which are the subject of this debate.

Experience has given me a vivid understanding of the problems of those who find it difficult to pay for these things. I am on record as having raised this matter as far back as 1976 before I found myself personally involved as a parent.

I will be interested to hear the response of the Minister. It may be her first reply to an Adjournment debate, in which case I hope that she will take the opportunity to give a most positive reply and set a good precedent for the future.

Diabetes mellitus, or sugar diabetes, affects more than 1 per cent. of the population of the United Kingdom and the incidence is increasing. It can develop in childhood or at any stage and almost invariably remains with a person for the rest of his life. Over 150,000 diabetics in England and Wales are dependent on injections of insulin, usually twice a day. They must also monitor their blood sugar level constantly through blood and urine tests. They must also follow a careful diet.

When the Minister is tempted to make controversial comments about healthy eating, she should remember that there is one group of people whose lives depend on healthy eating and who watch their diet very carefully — the diabetics. Because sugar-free jams and other items are often expensive and because they need to eat at frequent intervals—they often have to buy a snack when out in the middle of the morning or the afternoon when someone else would wait until lunch or dinner—they face higher costs for food.

It is therefore very important that they should not also have to face costs for essential medical requirements, but at present they do, because neither plastic syringes nor blood glucose monitoring strips are available on prescription from family doctors. At present the only syringe which GPs can prescribe is the cumbersome glass syringe, which has to be sterilised each time it is used.

The disposable plastic syringe is a far better alternative. It is much easier to handle and carry, and does not require sterilisation. In my experience it is extremely difficult to inject a small child with a glass syringe. Both hands are needed to hold the glass syringe and the plunger is apt to slip. If, however, one is holding and trying to reassure a child, one needs a spare hand for at least some of the time.

It is much easier for a child with small hands to use a plastic syringe for his or her own injections. We want to encourage children to do their own injections. The teenager is able to lead a much more normal life if he can carry with him a plastic syringe instead of all the equipment that is associated with the glass syringe. It is also much easier to obtain accuracy over small doses with plastic syringes. That is vital for control, which has become much more important since the introduction of the U100 insulin, where the marks to which one works are often very small.

Given all the advantages of plastic syringes for many diabetics, they find it difficult to understand why the Government insist that their general practitioner should prescribe for them only the glass syringe. Could it be that an enormous cost is involved? The evidence suggests otherwise. There is now considerable experience which suggests that it may be cheaper to issue disposable syringes. A study in Southampton, reported in the British Medical Journal of 28 June 1986, put the cost of plastic syringes at less than half that for glass syringes and reported direct savings to the health authority as a result of issuing plastic syringes. Other work, by Dr. Arnold Bloom at Wittington hospital and Dr. N. R. Waugh at Dundee, also questions the Government's cost figures.

Several factors have to be borne in mind in assessing the cost of glass syringes, including the amount of insulin that is wasted in them because of "dead" space—insulin that is not used and that is washed out when the syringe is cleaned. However, there is one reason, above all, for the disparity between the Government's figures and those which are accepted by the medical profession. It is now accepted professionally that disposable syringes can be used more than once, and most of the diabetics who use them say that they use them several times. There is no evidence, if the syringes are kept in proper conditions—which usually means just putting them in the fridge—that this poses any risk of infection. Indeed, there is thought to be a greater risk from the use of glass syringes. However, the Department of Health and Social Security refuses to admit that re-use is acceptable, and it assumes that diabetics wish to be supplied with two new plastic syringes per day. They might like such a facility, but they are realistic enough to welcome a more limited supply of syringes that can be re-used.

This extraordinary obstinacy by the Department, in the face of overwhelming medical opinion, is causing real hardship to many diabetics. I plead with the Minister to bring about a change of attitude. If she is still worried about the cost and the number of syringes to be issued, there is one way out. She could allow diabetics to be issued with a voucher that is equivalent to the present cost of prescribing glass syringes. Then diabetics could choose for themselves whether to spend it on a glass syringe or on disposable syringes. At least they would be able to make that choice for themselves, with the advice of their doctor, at no extra cost to the Government.

There is another item of essential equipment that the family doctor cannot prescribe—blood glucose monitoring strips. If a diabetic is to avoid appalling complications, such as blindness, kidney failure or amputations, strict control is essential, and the only reliable way to achieve strict control is through blood testing. Urine testing is useful but it is not so reliable, because the time lapse is much greater. Many diabetics, therefore, are expected to take samples of their blood for testing, perhaps several times a day; yet we also expect them to pay for the privilege of undergoing these very uncomfortable tests by buying their own testing strips at a retail cost of about £15 for a tube of 50 strips. The Government could make these strips available on prescription at a cost of less than £5 million a year.

If more diabetics carried out more frequent blood tests, there is no doubt that complications and hospital admissions could be greatly reduced. The cost of the admission of diabetics is about £90 million a year and the cost of treating complications is about £62 million a year. I emphasise that control prevents hospital admissions. A well-controlled diabetic will be admitted to hospital much less often and the likelihood of complications will be much less great. Five million pounds is a tiny figure to set against a massive potential reduction in human misery and in cost to the National Health Service.

The Minister will no doubt point out that it is possible for both disposable syringes and testing strips to be supplied free by hospital consultants to their patients, even though general practitioners cannot prescribe them. But that is not an adequate alternative. Many diabetics are not under hospital care, and it is the Government's policy that care of patients with chronic diseases should be increasingly undertaken by family doctors who are able to see patients more frequently and deal with all aspects of their health. I support that policy. I think that it is sensible in many cases. The family doctor should be entrusted with the regular week-by-week supervision of the chronically ill patient. It would relieve the hospital clinics of a great deal of pressure and, for many patients, it is the best way to receive care. Improving the standards of GP training and retraining make it a more satisfactory alternative.

However, it will not be possible to maintain that policy if there is a two-tier standard of service under which a consultant can prescribe what the diabetic patient needs but a general practitioner cannot. The patient, once he realises that he can get the supplies he needs by remaining under hospital care, will prefer to do so rather than transfer to the GP who he knows is restricted from prescribing what he needs.

Hospitals are under such pressure that the ability of consultants to make syringes and testing strips available to their patients may be under threat. It has been reported to me that in some areas, not my own, that difficulty is beginning to arise.

I urge the Minister to press the case as hard as she can with her colleagues, including her Treasury colleagues, who I understand are considering the specific issue. A number of hon. Members contacted Ministers, including Treasury Ministers, earlier this year. I have before me a reply from the Chief Secretary to the Treasury to the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) in which the Chief Secretary said that he is aware of the case for making both blood test strips and plastic insulin syringes for diabetics available under the family practitioner service. He said:

> "Nevertheless, there are resource implications which both we and the DHSS have to consider—and set against other major demands on resources under the NHS. There could also be knock-on effects for other patients . . . the growing lobby in favour of issue of free syringes to drug abusers to help combat the spread of AIDS".

I might say in passing that diabetics simply would not understand it and would find it extraordinary if the Government were to decide that syringes should be made available to drug abusers because of the AIDS problem but not made available to diabetics. That would be a terrible slap in the face for people who have struggled so hard over the years to control a condition. The Chief Secretary continued:

> "Norman Fowler and I will be considering this issue when we come to the Public Expenditure Survey in the autumn. I obviously cannot at this stage comment on the likely outcome; but I will certainly bear in mind your representations."

I hope that that process of consideration is going ahead favourably and that the Minister, who has recently come to office, will add her voice to the pressure on Treasury

[Mr. A. J. Beith]

Ministers to be helpful, especially regarding glucose monitoring strips. The British Medical Association has made representations to her Department, as have Government and Opposition Members. The hon. Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern) has asked me to make known his support for that, as well as for the issue of plastic syringes. The costs involved are small. The resultant savings in treatment costs are potentially large. The Minister could bring great relief to thousands of diabetics who seek, by rigorous self-control, to lead full, active, long and healthy lives. They deserve the Government's support.

1.7 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): I congratulate the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) on his success in the ballot and on his diligence in raising this important subject. I suspect that I share with him a degree of disappointment that we are debating it so late at night when many other hon. Members have expressed interest in and support for the points he made. I recognise also that he made his points from personal experience, having a diabetic child. He may not be aware that diabetes is also present in my own family—on my father's side. I took a close interest in the subject before I became a Minister.

As the hon. Gentleman rightly said, the condition diabetes mellitus is found in 1 to 2 per cent. of the population. With proper treatment, diabetic patients can be kept fit and in full productive work. Over the past 40 years, great progress has been made in the management of patients with diabetes and its complications. We have seen significant improvements in understanding the disease and its effects, in the development and evaluation of new forms of detection and treatment, and in enabling sufferers and their families to live their lives with the minimum of disruption and anxiety.

As the hon. Gentleman said, diabetics need to control their blood sugar level. Most can do that through diet or tablets. However, 150,000 to 200,000 diabetics in England and Wales need injections of insulin to manage their condition effectively. We have the greatest sympathy and indeed admiration for those people, especially children and their families. They must exercise self-discipline, monitor their condition, follow a controlled diet, and give themselves daily injections of insulin.

I shall deal in turn with each of the commodities that we have been discussing, the first of which is blood test strips. Personal blood glucose monitoring is an integral part of modern diabetic care. The urine tests which are available on the Health Service are adequate for diabetics whose condition is controlled by diet or tablets, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman will agree. They are quick and easy to use. For insulin-using diabetics, urine tests allow some measure of control and have been standard and available for many years. More recently, it has been recognised that blood testing has advantages over urine tests. First, they give an accurate and direct reading of blood sugar level at the time of the test and, secondly, that fact allows the patient to take action to keep blood sugar within normal levels immediately, if necessary.

That is extremely important, since too low a blood sugar level—hypoglycaemia—can lead to unconsciousness, even death, and too high a blood sugar level—hyperglycaemia—for a prolonged period increases the potential risk of long-term complications such as blindness and kidney failure. However, blood testing is not particularly pleasant. It involves pricking the finger, and some people will undoubtedly prefer urine testing, perhaps particularly for children.

I have some syringes with me. It is claimed that plastic disposable syringes are more comfortable. The needles are thinner and are lubricated. It is claimed that they are more convenient than re-usable glass syringes. We understand why many patients, especially children, prefer them. In some cases consultants may arrange for them to be provided under the hospital service because they are medically necessary, but in most cases they offer no medical advantage over glass and metal syringes and re-usable needles, which GPs can prescribe, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman will admit.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, both blood glucose testing strips and disposable syringes are available on the Health Service through hospitals when they are medically necessary. That is where a consultant thinks it advisable. The hon. Gentleman may say that that is not good enough, but that is a matter of fact. For some years we have seen sustained pressure from patients, doctors, hon. Members and all those interested for these items to be available on GP prescription.

The effort became more notable last year when the general medical services committee of the British Medical Association and the British Diabetic Association joined forces in making representations to the Department. That culminated in a meeting last November with officials of my Department and I shall return to what was said at that meeting.

Early-day motion No. 1070 attracted before the recess 38 signatures of hon. Members. A deputation of hon. Members came and saw my right hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Mr. Hayhoe), who was then the Minister for Health, on 15 July. Since August we have received more than 300 letters from hon. Members on both sides of the House. Many constituents were undoubtedly encouraged to write by an article in the August edition of "Balance" magazine, which is published by the BDA, and which gave precise and accurate advice on how to lobby Members of Parliament.

I shall now turn to the drug tariff list of prescribable appliances, about which we are talking. I hope that it is obvious that the Government have considerable sympathy with the case put forward by the hon. Gentleman and other colleagues. So why are blood glucose testing strips and disposable syringes not prescribable by general practitioners? There has always been an approved list of dressings and appliances which a general practitioner may prescribe. The intention of that list was to ensure that the range of dressings and appliances commonly used in general practice were readily available through retail chemists. The list was never intended to be comprehensive. It would not be practicable or cost-effective to include all items which may be supplied through the hospital service.

It is also important to keep that list up to date. Changes are made in consultation with the medical and pharmaceutical professions in the light of the changing needs of general practice, the extent of demand, the availability and the cost. There is relatively little problem where new products are cheaper, or at least no more expensive, than products for a similar purpose already on the list. I hope that we keep the list up to date with more modern methods and materials. However, where the products have a high price they must be considered alongside competing priorities for the NHS.

I have some detailed figures which I hope will be of assistance to the hon. Gentleman. The comparable product for blood test strips is urine test strips. The family practitioner services currently spend over £2 million a year on urine testing. The drug tariff price for urine test strips is about £1·50 for 50, or about 3p each. A mail order company is advertising blood test strips in "Balance" magazine at £9·15 for 50, or 18p each, while another company is selling them at £13·50 for 50, which is 27p each. That is 27p compared with 3p, so we are talking about nine times the cost. Retail prices can be even higher.

Even assuming that we could arrange supplies at a substantially reduced cost, we estimate that the additional cost to the family practitioner services could be up to £10 million a year. There is the question of offsetting the saving, but at present we have insufficient information to estimate the saving to the hospital service from a reduction in the issue of blood test strips or the saving from reduced in-patient admissions resulting from better control of the condition. However, I am aware of the case that is being made.

The question of syringes is more complicated. Disposable syringes are a lot cheaper than re-usable glass ones. The most widely used brand advertised in "Balance" costs £1·17 for 10, or 12p each. The drug tariff price for glass and metal syringes is £6·25. Needles are about 16p each and the carrying case for the syringes and needles costs £1·75.

Glass syringes and the needles that go with them can, of course, be used many times, but one does not need to be a mathematical genius to work out that they cost 50 times as much, or perhaps even more.

We are currently spending about £1·2 million a year on these re-usable syringes and needles. A simple calculation based on the number of times an average diabetic will use insulin and the number of diabetics who are likely to use these syringes shows that it would cost at least £8 million to supply disposable syringes to all insulin-dependent diabetics for use on this basis.

We accept that many diabetics who buy their own disposable syringes use them more than once, but there is a wide variation in the pattern of use. It is difficult to predict what would happen if disposable syringes were provided free, bearing in mind that diabetics do not pay prescription charges and would have no incentive therefore to re-use them.

The equipment is also supplied sterile and is not intended to be resterilised. It is clearly intended for single use. Manufacturers, bearing in mind product liability, make it clear that syringes are intended for single use. The packet that I have with me, imported from the United States, has "Single use" printed twice on the packet. It has "Use once and destroy" printed clearly on the packet, and that is printed on every syringe. The Department could be in a difficult legal position, we are advised, if we instructed people to ignore that advice, and something went wrong. It is also clear from our correspondence that many diabetics use them only once and discard them.

Mr. Beith: Will the Minister consider the matter again? Will she take account of the strong, professionally qualified medical opinion that re-use is not only safe but is probably safer than the glass syringe? The Department really should find a way through these technical and legal difficulties.

Mrs. Currie: As I said earlier, the Department is discussing closely and in great detail with the medical advisers and representatives of the British Diabetic Association. Many more of these goods are becoming available on the market, and perhaps that makes our life a little easier than it might have been some time ago.

Like diabetics, other patients, such as drug misusers, may get disposable syringe on the National Health Service through the hospital service. GPs may not prescribe them. Drug misusers attending special NHS drug dependence centres may get single use syringes for use with prescribed drugs. Doctors prescribe treatment in individual cases. The recommended practice in most cases is to prescribe an oral preparation for a short weaning-off period. Nevertheless, I take seriously the hon. Gentleman's argument.

Even record levels of spending on the National Health Service do not mean that we can afford to do everything that we would like. We take seriously, however, the issues that the hon. Gentleman has raised and those taken up by all other correspondents. We must bear in mind that testing strips and disposable syringes are available on the Health Service through hospitals when they are medically necessary. Provision may vary somewhat according to individual clinical decisions, and that would apply if general practitioners were to prescribe. It varies to some extent also according to health authorities' different views on spending priorities. We understand the arguments for supply on GPs' prescriptions.

I have taken further advice on which of the two different pieces of equipment we would regard as having the higher priority. I recognise that many patients would prefer to see syringes given a higher priority because of the comfort and convenience of use, but as a matter of simple fact the medical advice that has been received is that it would be the glucose blood testing strips that would be regarded medically as the higher priority. That course would enable an improvement to be made in the quality of information to the diabetic. The disposable syringes, while presenting more comfort, would make no medical change in the condition of the patient. This was accepted by the general medical services committee and the British Diabetic Association when they met the Department's officials in November.

I am unable to make the promises that the hon. Gentleman wants on making blood testing strips available on GP prescription, but that provision will have a high priority if and when resources become available. Price is an important factor, and the strips will not be made available unless a satisfactory price can be negotiated.

Disposable syringes are not likely to be available on GP prescription just at present. We are, however, keeping the comparative costs of disposable and re-usable syringes under close scrutiny. The BDA tells us that it intends to put proposals to the Department for a voucher scheme for hypodermic equipment along the lines that the hon. Gentleman has suggested, and this is a proposal that we shall consider carefully.

I know that the hon. Gentleman may not find my response wholly satisfactory, and I am sorry about that.

[Mrs. Currie]

I hope I have assured him, however, of our concern to ensure that all the necessary medical items are available to diabetics and other patients through the NHS.

Question put and agreed to.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITIONS

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, and that of the House, I beg leave to present a petition from the deaconesses of the Church of England. In accordance with the customs and procedures of the House, I shall be brief. The petition, which has been signed by 601 deaconesses, states that whereas they already fulfil the historic and distinctive role of deaconesses within the Church, they remain in law members of laity

this honourable House will support the Deacons (Ordination of Women) Measure, currently before Parliament, in order that deaconesses may be accepted into the historic ministry of the Church as deacons.

I beg leave to present the petition.

To lie upon the Table.

Isle of Sheppey (Access)

9.36 am

Mr. Roger Moate (Faversham): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, and that of the House, I beg leave to present a petition from his worshipful the mayor of Swale, Councillor Kenneth Ingleton. I wholeheartedly endorse the petition, as I believe do all the residents and industrialists on the Isle of Sheppey. The petition seeks to remind the House that the Isle of Sheppey, which has a population of 34,000, which doubles at times of the year, is limited to one access on or off the island, which is a lifting access bridge that is raised frequently. The petitioners pray that the House of Commons will urgently examine the best method of improving this access to cope with existing and future traffic and give a clear indication of the timescale within which such improved access should be commenced.

I beg leave to present the petition.

To lie upon the Table.

PUBLIC TRUSTEE AND ADMINISTRATION OF FUNDS BILL [LORDS] [MONEY]

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Public Trustee and Administration of Funds Bill [Lords], it is expedient to authorise—

(1) the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any increase attributable to that Act in the sums payable out of money so provided under any other Act;

(2) the payment into or out of the Consolidated Fund of sums or increased sums falling to be so paid by virtue of any provisions of that Act amending section 39 of the Administration of Justice Act 1982.

Family Law Bill [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

9.40 am

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second Time.

My short speech will not reflect the diversity of family law matters that are covered in the four parts of the Bill, the first three of which deal with separate Law Commission reports. I take this opportunity to express my gratitude, which I am sure is shared by the whole House, to both the English and Scottish Law Commissions for all their hard and magnificent work, which is ably illustrated by parts I to III in respect of law reform.

Part I gives effect to the recommendation of both commissions that is contained in the report entitled "Custody of Children — Jurisdiction and Enforcement within the United Kingdom". This part, by providing uniform jurisdictional rules for the determination of custody disputes and the procedural means whereby a custody order may be recognised, registered and enforced throughout the United Kingdom, will deal with the internal United Kingdom problem of child abduction.

Part II gives effect, with modification, to another joint report entitled "Recognition of Foreign Nullity Decrees and Related Matters". This is a technical law reform matter and is designed to assimilate the grounds for the recognition of foreign nullity decrees to those grounds, which are also modified by part II, for the recognition of divorces and legal separations that are contained in the Recognition of Divorces and Legal Separations Act of 1971.

Part III carries out the recommendation of the English Law Commission that is contained in its report entitled "Declarations in Family Matters". This part provides a new code for England and Wales for the granting of declaratory relief in matters of matrimonial status, legitimacy, legitimation and adoption.

Lastly, clause 64, in part IV, which relates to miscellaneous matters, enlarges the rule-making powers of the Matrimonial Causes Rule Committee to enable that committee to make costs rules which distinguish between legally aided and privately funded cases. Only with these wider powers can scales of costs be prescribed separately for legally aided cases as the legal profession desires. The clause was amended in another place and I understand that both branches of the legal profession are now content with this provision. Clauses 65 to 67 make technical amendments to other legislation dealing with international and criminal aspects of child abduction that will make them more effective.

9.42 am

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): The Solicitor-General's Second Reading speech struck a nice balance between general explanation and detail, and there is a considerable amount of detail in this technical and complicated measure. The Bill is welcome and I have no intention of trying to delay its passage through the House, at least not unduly.

I shall take this opportunity to say a few words about family law, including matters that are in the Bill and others that are not and perhaps should be. The Bill's title may raise hopes in some quarters which its contents will fail to meet. For example, the Law Commission has recently reported on illegitimacy. In summary, it recommends that the legal consequences of illegitimacy, as they affect the non-marital child, should be removed from the law. I support that recommendation. In a written answer of 4 June the right hon. and learned Attorney-General promised that legislation would be introduced "at the earliest possible opportunity", in response to the recommendation. That legislation does not appear in the Bill, but perhaps that is something that we shall be debating in the next Session, perhaps when dealing with a family law reform Bill. At a later stage we may consolidate such a measure with this Bill.

Equally disappointed will be the supporters of the family courts campaign. The Bill does not have anything to do with family courts either, but there are good reasons for initiating family courts. Such a system would unify and thereby simplify various jurisdictions for family affairs. It would provide a vehicle to introduce simpler and quicker procedures which emphasise conciliation and the desirability of agreement between the parties. It would be possible to provide adequate conciliatory and welfare services and to remove family matters from courts that are accustomed traditionally to dealing with contested matters, and, in the case of magistrates courts, criminal matters.

A family court system would reflect the increasingly sympathetic approach to divorce which takes such matters beyond those which are normally considered by courts of law. Family courts exist and function successfully in Australia, New Zealand and some parts of the United States of America. Our present system creates more bitterness than is necessary and encourages people to spend money, sometimes public money, via the legal aid scheme on lawyers. I an not convinced that good always comes of spending money on lawyers, and certainly not in the realm of family law. However, the Bill does not deal with family courts.

The Bill is based on the work of the English and Scottish Law Commissions and I associate myself with the Solicitor-General's remarks about his gratitude to both commissions for the work. In 1981, in its 15th annual report to Parliament, the commission stated:

"It becomes very difficult for us to plan our work if the Government does not express a view on recommendations made by ourselves and others within a reasonable time after delivery of the reports containing them."

"A number of important law reform proposals made by other bodies during the past 10 years or so have not been implemented. In some instances it is not even known whether they are accepted by the Government in principle."

Things have not improved. In its most recent report, the 20th, the commission lists a further 15 reports, two of which go back to 1981, which have not resulted in Government action.

The House recently debated the Lord Chancellor's salary increase. Whatever that substantial rise was based on, it was not productivity.

The Solicitor-General indicated dissent.

Mr. Brown: The Solicitor-General seems to object to the idea of productivity improvements in the Lord Chancellor's Department, which should certainly take place in the higher echelons. I cannot understand why he takes such a view.

The main argument that is usually advanced for delaying the recommendations of the commission—some of them are highly technical but non-controversial—is that parliamentary time cannot be found. This excuse is advanced by a Government who intend to take the Bill through all its stages in this place this morning. The House does not delay any non-controversial legislation that is based on the work of the commission. Nor has such legislation been unreasonably treated in another place. It is the Government's failure to bring such matters to Parliament which is the major obstruction to law reform.

The Bill is highly technical and perhaps it needs to be. I feel, however, that it makes heavy weather of some fairly simple matters. Would it not have been possible in some way to treat the separate jurisdictions in the United Kingdom as different contracting countries for the purposes of the Child Abduction and Custody Act 1985? The Solicitor-General will recall that I moved an amendment to that measure when it was in Committee and that the Attorney-General said that there was a technical objection to it. He said that it contained a "fatal flaw" and claimed that it was inconsistent with section 25(1)(b) of the 1985 Act

"because once the United Kingdom custody order has been registered, that clause would cancel it. That is a technical reason".—[Official Report, Standing Committee F, Tuesday 9 July 1985; c. 4.]

I am not entirely convinced by that argument. I have to say, however, as I did in Committee, that there can be no political objection to taking the route that is outlined in the Bill instead of that set out in my amendment.

The Bill is divided into four separate parts, and part I gives effect to the recommendations of the commissions on the recognition and enforcement of custody orders between separate jurisdictions in the United Kingdom.

The only matter that I wish to raise on part I arises from clause 42(2) and (3). Those provisions mean that, once a child's parents are divorced in one part of the United Kingdom a custody order cannot be obtained in another part of the United Kingdom unless an order as described in this section is first obtained from the court in which the divorce was obtained. Thus, if a child's parents divorce in England or Wales and the child subsequently becomes habitually resident in Scotland it would be necessary to obtain an order from the English or Welsh court. That does not appear to be the case in the converse situation as the exclusion does not apply if the child is either habitually resident in England, Wales or Northern Ireland, or present there and not habitually resident in another part of the United Kingdom. There is no similar provision made in respect of Scotland, so there appears to be a significant difference between the respective jurisdictions.

However, significantly, if the special provision in respect of England, Wales and Northern Ireland is correct, it makes the exclusion redundant. In effect it is saying that, where there is jurisdiction, the exclusion will not apply. In that where there is no jurisdiction the exclusion is superfluous, I find the purpose of that exclusion hard to define. Will the Solicitor-General deai with that point?

Part II deals with the recognition of the validity of divorces, annulments and legal separations. It would not be right not to refer to the one aspect of this part which has occasioned public comment — the issue of the Moslem family law ordnance. Clause 54 states:

"'proceedings' means judicial and other proceedings" and deals with that. Under the Pakistani Moslem family law ordnance, provision is made for a procedure to replace the talaq in Moslem law. A talaq is a simple pronouncement of divorce by the husband. It is not obtained through proceedings, but under the ordnance it is held to be so obtained. A declaration of divorce is made and the wife and a Government official are notified. After notification there follows a period of 90 days in which the official may, but need not, attempt to reconcile the parties. At the end of the period, in the absence of any reconciliation, the parties are considered to be divorced.

The issue is whether that procedure merits recognition on the grounds of the residence, domicile or nationality of only one party to the marriage or whether it should be recognised only if both parties are domiciled in Pakistan and neither is habitually resident in the United Kingdom. The question is not whether we should recognise Pakistani law, but what limits should be placed on the jurisdiction of that law. Should a Pakistani national habitually resident in the United Kingdom and married to a United Kingdom national be able to obtain a divorce in that way? Should a United Kingdom national married to a Pakistani national habitually resident in the United Kingdom by going to Pakistan be able to obtain a divorce in that way? If not, perhaps proceedings should be defined in order to exclude that possibility. The principal objection to a talaq is that it discriminates against women because the procedure is available only to men. If a Moslem woman wants a divorce she must initiate judicial proceedings.

Part III is based closely on the Law Commission's declarations on family matters. I can find nothing objectionable in it, not even clause 61 which must be largely of historical interest.

Part IV is entitled "Miscellaneous and General". Clause 64 deals with the power to make rules of court. It may be thought to be unexceptionable, but it provides:

> "Rules of court made by the rule-making authority . . . may amend or repeal any statutory provision relating to the practice and procedure of the Supreme Court."

Is there any precedent for empowering an extra-parliamentary body to make by amendment or to repeal statute law?

Although the Family Law Bill is tortuous and is a roundabout way of achieving certain objectives, it deals with an important matter and I do not wish to delay its enactment unduly.

9.54 am

The Solicitor-General: I am grateful for the welcome that the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) has given the Bill and for his kind words about the Law Commissions. I note his disappointment that the Bill, which is not insubstantial, does not do more in one fell swoop than implement the provisions of three substantial reports of the Law Commissions.

On the reform of the law relating to illegitimacy, he and those whose interests he properly represents will not be long disappointed. The hon. Gentleman will know that the Lord Chancellor's Department has issued a consultation paper on family courts. The period of consultation expires at the end of this month and my right hon. and noble Friend looks forward to considering the representations made during that consultation period. I must reply to the hon. Gentleman's friendly criticism of the Lord Chancellor's productivity. The House will accept that he has been the most vigorously law reforming Lord Chancellor this century.

The hon. Gentleman raised many detailed questions and he will not expect very detailed replies. On his point about clause 42(2) and (3), which relates to custody orders, I must say that Scottish law, from which we have learned, adapted and adopted so much, is different and imposes technical requirements which have had a significant role in the formulation of clause 42.

On part II, the hon. Gentleman rightly drew attention to the discriminatory effect of the talaq and other informal divorces against women. These are complicated and difficult matters. The Bill's policy is to take a more restrictive approach in respect of divorces obtained other than by judicial or other proceedings. It takes as its basis the present law of recognition of such informal divorces contained in section 6 of the Recognition of Divorces and Legal Separations Act 1971, but it is more restrictive than that. Informal divorces will be recognised only if granted in the country where both parties to the marriage were domiciled or where a party to the marriage was domiciled and the other party was domiciled in a country under whose law the divorce, annulment or legal separation is recognised as valid. No such decree will be recognised if one party or both partes have been habitually resident in the United Kingdom for at least a year before the divorce was obtained.

In addition, clause 51 provides grounds on which the court may refuse to recognise informal divorces because there is no official certificate certifying that the divorce is effective in the country in which it was obtained or where one of the parties was domiciled in another country, but there is a certificate that the divorce is recognised as valid under the law of that country. The Bill's policy is the necessity and desirability to have some objective certification or assurance of the validity of the relevant divorce.

Lastly, under clause 64, the hon. Gentleman asked whether there is precedent for the formulation that gives to the Rules Committee power to amend statutory rules in the terms that the hon. Gentleman accurately quoted. The answer to his question is yes. The matter was gone into at considerable length in another place. There is precedent, which is very tightly controlled and restricted in this Bill. Nevertheless, it is desirable. The alternative is that main legislation would be required whenever minor amendments needed to be made.

I hope that I have dealt adequately with these matters and that we may now proceed.

Parliamentary Constituencies Bill [Lords]

10.3 am

Order for Second Reading read.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

This Bill consolidates the House of Commons (Redistribution of Seats) Acts from 1949 to 1979, together with a small number of related enactments. It brings together the law relating to the establishment of parliamentary constituencies and the process of reviewing the distribution of seats undertaken by the Boundary Commissions for England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland.

The Bill, which was prepared by the Law Commission, has been passed in another place where, in the usual way, it was referred to the Joint Committee on Consolidation Bills. That Committee reported to both Houses on 25 June that the Bill is pure consolidation. No change in the present law will be effected.

Our thanks are due once again to the Law Commission and the Joint Committee for their work on this useful contribution to the continuous process of keeping the statute book in easily accessible form.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): The Bill is pure consolidation, and on that basis it is acceptable. I add my thanks to those of the Solicitor-General to both the Law Commission and the Joint Committee on Consolidation Bills for their valuable work. It is right that we should thank them when consolidation Bills come before the House.

The purpose of consolidation Bills is to make life easier for practitioners and those who have to refer frequently to our legislation. I am not sure how frequently this Bill will need to be referred to—not very often, I should have thought. It is pure consolidation, and I see no reason at all why the passage of the Bill should be delayed.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Food Protection

10.5 am

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Gummer): I beg to move,

That the Food Protection (Emergency Prohibitions) (England) (No. 2) Order 1986 (S.I., 1986, No. 1689), dated 29th September 1986, a copy of which was laid before this House on 30th September, be approved.

With permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I suggest that it would be convenient to take this and the other orders on the Order Paper together.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): If that is agreeable to the House, so be it.

Mr. Gummer: On Saturday 26 April 1986 the very serious accident at Chernobyl occurred. However, it was not until Monday 28 April that the detection of increased levels of radioactivity by the Swedish authorities alerted the West. On the day after, Tuesday, the Ministry of Agriculture initiated daily testing of milk and obtained meteorological forecasts of wind movements. The air current carrying the radioactive material went in a wide arc over Europe in the course of the next few days. On Friday, an increase in radioactivity was detected by the Ministry's Lowestoft laboratory. Arrangements for more extensive monitoring were immediately put in hand, with particular attention being paid to those foodstuffs that were most immediately affected — milk and leaf vegetables.

Although the House is not exactly full this morning, the details of how we dealt with this problem are important to have on the record simply because we had not expected that the powers that were given under an Act that had been passed only a year before would be so early used. One might say that public confidence is illustrated by the fact that vast numbers of angry, shouting Members of Parliament are not here to complain that the public were not properly looked after. Public confidence depends upon the public feeling that there is an adequate system to deal with even such horrific accidents as this. Therefore, I hope that the House will allow me to sketch quickly those measures that were taken so that if Opposition Members wish to raise particular points about what was done they will do so against a logical background that will be on the record.

It was quickly apparent that the major radionuclides were iodine and caesium and that, of these, radio-iodine was initially the most important. It will be recalled that these radionuclides work according to different time scales. Therefore, one was able to concentrate upon the one rather than the other. However, we also appreciated that radiocaesium would build up over a longer period.

On the Sunday, at 2 pm, the Ministry opened its operations room to enable those who until then had been in constant telephonic communication to co-ordinate their assessment and monitoring results and to handle inquiries from the general public centrally. My right hon. Friend and I have laid down a clear policy that the public should be fully informed of matters of concern such as this. All relevant detail is provided so that the public can rely fully on our statements. However, this policy opens the way for some to add unfounded fears and speculation to very real concerns. To put the figures into context, my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculuture, Fisheries and Food made a number of television and radio appearances over the bank holiday weekend to reassure the public that radiation levels in food did not present a hazard to health and that there was no need for anyone to change their normal consumption patterns of milk and other fresh foodstuffs.

Our monitoring over the bank holiday weekend showed that levels of radioactive iodine in milk had peaked. Levels in cows' milk generally did not exceed a few per cent. of the derived emergency reference levels—I am sorry that one has to use such phrases but there is no other way to be accurate and if we are not accurate the technical press will soon pick it up—for radio-iodine recommended by the National Radiological Protection Board in line with the recommendations of the International Commission on National Radiological Protection. I think that we can accept that as being a reasonable level against which to measure our concern. Peak levels on individual farms in the areas of highest rainfall did not exceed 20 per cent. of that level.

We made a distinction between giving all the information necessary and not giving particular information about a particular farm. If a farm is tested, but not its neighbour, it would not add to anybody's information and it would certainly increase the difficulties in getting the testing done. We averaged the results and gave the top, bottom and middle levels. We felt that that was the best way and I think that that has been generally accepted.

Activating our existing contingency plans, we set in train one of the most extensive monitoring operations of foodstuffs ever undertaken. As the monitoring of food was only part of a full-scale monitoring of water, air and the environment generally, it was agreed that the composite data would be made available through another of those curious organisations, the co-ordinating technical information centre at the Department of the Environment, and that such data should be available for consultation in London. In addition, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food made food data available at the Ministry's regional offices. Attention was drawn to that in the daily press bulletins put out by the TIC on 10 and 15 May. When the TIC was stood down in the middle of May, my Department continued to issue results of monitoring in press notices.

Our monitoring showed that levels of radioactivity in milk and vegetables declined. However, it was recognised that radiocaesium, being a longer-term problem, would need continued monitoring as it built up in the muscle of animals grazing contaminated pasture. From about the middle of May levels of radiocaesium in young unfinished lambs not then ready for slaughter in areas of high rainfall over the bank holiday weekend showed such levels building up. We immediately intensified our monitoring to identify the exact locations where radiocaesium levels in sheepmeat might cause concern.

We also commissioned the Institute of Terrestrial Ecology to undertake more detailed surveys of deposition patterns across the country to identify the precise areas likely to be affected. That information was available early in June and, with the monitoring results which we had built up, identified areas where levels in sheepmeat were likely to be high.

Since most early lamb comes from lowland areas it was there that action had to be considered most urgently and it became clear by mid-June that we would not be able to guarantee that radiocaesium in all sheep would fall to acceptable levels before some animals from those areas went for slaughter. Although our acceptable levels have a wide range of safety built into them it is still important to keep them as the clear levels by which we work.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I therefore decided to use, for the first time, powers available under part 1 of the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985 and an order was made on 20 June placing restrictions on the movement and slaughter of sheep for 21 days in certain areas of Cumbria and north Wales. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland introduced similar controls in parts of Scotland on 24 June. The purpose of those controls was primarily to ensure that no animals with levels of radiocaesium above the internationally recommended action level of 1,000 bq/kg would reach the consumer and also to enable us to monitor closely the levels of radioactivity in those areas.

Soon after the imposition of controls, monitoring showed that radiocaesium levels in parts of the designated areas had fallen to an extent which allowed those parts to be released from restriction. However, levels above 1,000 bq/kg continued to be found, particularly in upland areas where the greatest deposition occurred, and made it necessary to continue restrictions after the expiry of the original 21 days. Therefore, further orders had to be made on 3 and 8 July continuing the restrictions in areas of Cumbria, north Wales and Scotland for a further period of 21 days. Restrictions were lifted progressively as monitoring showed that it was safe to do so.

I am pleased to say that our models were right in predicting falling levels in most areas. However, no model is perfect and in the upland areas we encountered a number of special factors arising from the terrain and grazing habits of upland sheep. We must be clear about the remarkable achievements of the scientists who carry out the preparatory work in the event of an accident such as this. Their models proved to be successful.

However, there are particular elements in upland areas which we have discovered as a result of this accident. I think that hon. Members will agree that it is inconceivable that in making such predictions we would get everything right. We have learnt a good deal, about the effect of the deposition of radioactive material from rain of which we previously had little experience. One factor is the effect of different kinds of soil and the pattern of growth of grass.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): When the Minister began by saying how accurate his model had been I was worried that the Government were becoming complacent. It is mainly the upland areas that are affected by sheep restrictions and those are the very areas where he has admitted that things are going wrong. On 24 July the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Robinson), said that there had been alarmist reports that restrictions might be necessary for another six months. It is now clear that the restrictions have not only gone on for six months but are likely to go on for a further six months. Does the Minister now admit that there is a danger that the restrictions could continue for another six or nine months in those areas?

Mr. Gummer: We want to be as accurate as possible. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Wales was referring to alarmist views that large areas of the Principality, Cumbria and Scotland would continue to have restrictions. In fact, restrictions have already been removed from large parts of those areas. Having lived through that time and having been involved from day to day in considering how we dealt with the problem, I can say that one of the difficulties of being open, as we have been, at every point with the information that we had is that there are those who constantly want to pretend that there is something that they have not been told. We were trying to say that we were giving all the available information and acting on it. Widespread restrictions have not gone on for a long time, but that was just one of the predictions with which we had to deal at the time.

Our models are based upon a series of different possibilities. One would have been that the rain fell over the lowland areas at a particular time. Another would have been that the cloud was blown in a different direction. All I am saying is that all our models show clearly what would happen. The only areas in which we had difficulties were in the precise prediction of the effect of radiocaesium in a particular mixture in particular circumstances. We have learnt a good deal, but the action that we took was right in protecting the public's health in the circumstances.

I did not want to go through my speech without paying tribute to those who have done such a good job in preparation for such an accident merely because we are bound to concentrate on those things from which we have learnt for the future. That is not complacency. A bit of gratitude, given the hours that those people have worked and their input, is necessary.

The restrictions were lifted progressively. We were able to lift the restrictions in some areas in time for farmers to proceed normally, but in some other areas we could not do that. To meet the problem we introduced a scheme which would allow sheep marked on the head and neck with long-lasting paint to be moved out of the designated areas. Restrictions on the slaughter of such sheep remained in operation.

Since some parts of the designated areas were known to be likely to be ready for release earlier than others, the designated areas were divided into higher and lower deposition areas, depending upon the extent of contamination by radiocaesium. Sheep released from the higher deposition areas had to be marked with blue paint and those from the lower deposition areas with green paint. Restrictions on slaughter were to be removed only when all restrictions in similar areas in the United Kingdom had been lifted.

I am glad to say that it was possible to release green marked sheep from all restrictions from 30 September. The mark and release scheme was extended on 15 September to permit, under consent, the sale and movement of breeding animals inside and outside the designated areas. Such sheep were marked on the head and neck with red paint. I assure hon. Members that none of the colours had any political significance.

All this caused losses to the farmers and from the outset the Government pledged to compensate them. Throughout, we were determined that our schemes would be tailored to real needs rather than to producing speedy solutions which would have turned out to be inappropriate.

Our conversations with the farming unions proved how complex it was to try to find a system which met particular needs. One cannot have a prejudged system to meet such compensation needs. The farming unions were faced with the same problems in that the situation was changing rapidly and it was not easy to know what their members would need. As the conversations proceeded, the farmers' priorities changed as they saw the effects of the scheme on the ground.

Our first compensation scheme was designed to help producers of those finished lambs which, through being held back by the restrictions, were subsequently rejected for variable premium on the ground of overfatness when their areas were released from the restrictions. Later we introduced a second scheme to compensate producers for their market price losses on marked sheep which were released from the designated areas and presented at store markets and sales, as well as liveweight certification centres. Our third scheme, announced last month, provides assistance towards the direct costs incurred by producers of finished lambs and cast ewes.

This brief account of the principles on which we have based our compensation understandably does not go into the considerable detail of the methods of assessing the market price losses, the "price blight" attaching to marked animals and our headage payments for direct losses sustained on certain sheep enterprises. In trying to work those out, we discovered that the details were complex. The complexity was necessary because the simpler solutions which we sought would not have met farmers' needs.

When one examines how the rest of Europe dealt with the problem it is noticeable that we were the most clearly prepared and that we provided the most carefully worked out and comprehensive compensation scheme. Some countries imposed restrictions on farmers but did not compensate them. Others imposed no restrictions and did not pay compensation. Some imposed restrictions and provided some compensation. No country went to the lengths that we did to ensure that the farmers were properly looked after.

The compensation that we gave to producers was provided as soon as we were able to establish and fully meet the real needs of the situation. Our compensation took account of marketing and sales patterns, already disrupted by the late spring, and poor finishing conditions. Detailed discussions with all the farmers' unions involved have, of course, been necessary. This has been hard work for all concerned. Ministry of Agriculture staff worked all hours. They and the people with whom they dealt in the farmers' unions should be congratulated.

We believe that the totality of compensation arrangements that we have now agreed—we are giving priority to paying out the sums as quickly as possible—represents a fair and balanced response to the needs of producers.

Looking ahead, I am aware that many farmers are anxious to know how long the controls will continue in force and I should like to say a few words about that. The restrictions introduced on 20 June imposed controls on more than 4 million sheep in Great Britian. I hope that that is remembered by those who suggested that there was an easy way of putting all the sheep under cover. Such people obviously never understood the figures or the details.

Today fewer than 300,000 sheep remain under restriction and many would not normally leave the upland areas before the spring. Progress has therefore been excellent, but radiation levels in sheep in some upland areas have not been falling as fast as in lowland areas.

[Mr. Gummer]

There is a combination of factors at work and our research has been greatly assisted by the recent development of new instruments by British instrument manufacturers — sometimes good comes out of ill — which were encouraged by the Ministry. They enable us to live-monitor sheep under field conditions.

One of the biggest problems was that there was no accurate way of dealing adequately with live animals. The animals had to be slaughtered and this was followed by a long period of testing. That was a problem which was foreseen but we had to be more restrictive. We had to assume that any one sample was a general sample.

Two factors appear to be contributing to the persistance of radiocaesium in the upland areas: first, the dietary and grazing habits of the animals, both of which are significantly different from animals with unimpeded access to relatively fast growing lowland pasture grass; secondly, the peaty soil conditions in many parts of the upland areas. It is well established that clay and other mineral soil materials have an affinity for caesium and quickly immobilise it within the soil. In well-drained soils whatever is not immobilised tends to be quickly removed by the surface run-off or seepage away from the rooting zone. The problem in the upland areas is that there are pockets of land poorly drained and in some cases totally devoid of mineral-binding agents.

It is quite clear that the sheep themselves show the same biological characteristics as other sheep when transferred out of the upland areas and radiocaesium levels fall away very rapidly once animals are moved to totally clean pasture. This indicates that once the affected areas return to normal the problem will be resolved.

Two natural processes may be expected to make a significant impact on the situation during the coming months. The first is the effect of winter conditions, including frosts, which will break up the soil and allow enhanced drainage of surface water and the second will be the new plant growth which will be coming through in the spring.

There is now extensive scientific evidence from many countries that deposited radiocaesium rapidly becomes immobilised and unavailable to biological systems. There is no reason to expect the long-term behaviour of Chernobyl to be markedly different. We are, however, looking at various ways to see if we can find action to speed things up. That is difficult because we are talking about very large areas which are often high and isolated. Many different holdings are involved. One can talk about reducing the numbers involved from 4 million to 300,000, but we must remember that 300,000 sheep are spread over large areas, so the ability directly to affect the nature of the land artificially is not easy.

Tests have already been carried out on the use of clay-like materials to absorb radiocaesium, both within soils and within the animals themselves. Preliminary results are encouraging and we shall continue to work in the hope that some simple treatment may be available to ensure the earliest possible return of these hill areas to their full productive potential. A considerable amount of research work is already under way both within my Department and by a number of independent research organisations acting under Ministry funding to ensure that we get the right solution.

In the meantime, we shall do whatever we can to ease the burdens on those farmers affected and will keep the mark-and-release scheme under continuous review. Operation of live monitoring equipment should now reduce to a minimum the number of sheep that need marking. In this way we should be able to ensure that any price blight will be minimised and the marketing pattern for sheep in the area concerned returned to normal as soon as possible.

Finally, I pay tribute to the farmers in Cumbria, Scotland and Wales who have co-operated with the Government on the introduction and implementation of the controls which were brought into effect through no fault of theirs.

I remind the House that we have an absolutely prime duty to care for the health of the nation and it must be in the farmers' own interest to recognise that prime duty. If there were any possibility that the Government had acted in any way which was not putting that duty first, considerably more damage would have been done to farmers and to the production of lambs. It is not easy to draw up regulations, They are the product of many months of work and on them depend the lives and livelihoods of many men and their families. For that reason, the actions taken depended very much on the co-operation of the farmers and the actions were taken in circumstances in which they were bewildered and worried about an accident the like of which we had not had before.

I hope that no one has ever accused me of any kind of complacency. The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) will know that I have Sizewell A and the putative Sizewell B in my constituency and can never be complacent about nuclear power or the possibility of nuclear accidents. The one thing in which we can take a pride is that when the facts were fully expressed and despite the actions of those who wanted to make more of them for all sorts of reasons, we were able to carry on a sensible and rational approach with the support of the farmers. We were able to do that with remarkably little, although some, anxiety and did not have the sort of panic which could so easily have arisen. Throughout, people recognised that food produced and presented on the market was absolutely safe for consumption. They recognised that no one needed to take any special measures about diet and knew that that was because of the action of the Government and the farmers and because of the carefully planned arrangements for monitoring and for taking action. That is a tribute to the large number of people who worked together to make such a situation possible.

We have to learn from this that things may not always turn out as plans predict. Every circumstance will be different. I hope that this sort of thing will never happen again, but we must be prepared for such events. If it did happen again — or if some other kind of accident of a parallel nature happened from a source other than nuclear energy — the shape of the cloud, the movement of the wind, the distribution of rain and the land and soil upon which the fallout took place would all introduce different factors. Even with the experience that we have had, there is no way in which we can predict how best to approach that.

Because we had to go through this difficult period we now know a good deal more. What is more, we have shown that the broad base of the system is satisfactory. What we have done and what we must now do formally is to ensure that all the lessons we can learn are learnt.

That process will go on until the last restriction is lifted and the last alteration is faced. We must learn those lessons so that we can continue to have a society in which by freely admitting the extent of a situation and clearly stating the dangers and the action that we are taking we can ensure that the population can have confidence in the pronouncements of the Government and of scientists. That alone will give people the chance to get through such a difficult period without the sort of panic that some people expected to happen.

Mr. Brynmor John (Pontypridd): I should like to thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for taking all these orders together. It has long been one of my ambitions to have a say in Scottish legislation, and your action has enabled me to achieve that ambition. I should like to express my thanks to the technical staff in the Ministry who, as the Minister said, worked long hours unceasingly. The best way in which we can express our gratitude is to make quite sure that the administrative and legislative framework in which they act is as good as possible. That is part of our job in this debate.

Secondly, I express my admiration for the way in which farmers accepted this event and adapted and responded to it. They showed remarkable restraint. I was about to say that farmers adopted a stoical attitude, but that was not always so, as I discovered when I spoke to worried people in Wales. They accepted and adapted to the situation in a remarkable way. We must never forget—the Minister did not, but I do not think sufficient attention was paid to it—that farmers' livelihoods were affected and that at one stage the future of their farms was in the balance. I hope that economic prospects are a bit better for them now, but for a long time they were worried people, not least because they were borrowing at absurd rates of interest which are likely to rise.

Not the least of our problems is the parliamentary procedure for debating this incident and its aftermath. As the Minister fairly said, the orders were made in late June and here we are debating them in late October. I say we are debating them, but that is not strictly true. This week it has not been easy to find out what we were to debate this morning. I first tried the House authorities and drew a blank. I then approached my side of the usual channels, my side being the riparian owners of my side of the usual channels, but they did not know either. They approached the Government side and matters became even more alarming because they did not know which orders were to be debated. It was only when the Ministry was approached that the orders to be debated were specified.

We are not debating the original orders because in many cases they no longer exist. We are debating their grandchildren and great-grandchildren and often much more distant offspring. For example, one of the orders before us, I think it is the Scottish order, is described as the No. 8 order. Orders have come into existence and have been amended and died without the House ever having considered them. It could be said that the reason for that is unfortunate timing. It was close to the Recess and we had a month and the emergency was to deal with other issues. It could be said that that was the main reason, but whatever the reason it has precluded the House from voicing the fears of people who are intimately involved. I recognise that that is far less important than the compensation and the protection for those whose livelihood is affected, but part of that protection is that we scrutinise regulations to test their adequacy. I hope that one of the lessons that we will bear in mind for the future is the importance of the adequacy of the arrangements for parliamentary scrutiny.

As the Minister said, this is not the first time that we have considered at least the framework in which such happenings occur. I was involved in the passage through the House of the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985. At that time Ministers were adamant that compensation was completely covered by two factors. The first was the principle that the polluter pays and the second was insurance. At that time we urged the Government to set up a national compensation fund as a fallback. There was a long debate about insurance. I want to give the Minister who opened the debate an easy ride, but I will give the Minister who is winding up the most difficult question. How many of the people affected had insurance or were able to insure against that happening? We were pooh-poohed when we said that it was an uninsurable risk, even though various insurance bodies had said that.

Under international law, surely the country of origin of the incident — in this case the Soviet Union — is responsible for paying compensation. However, there appears to be no prospect of it doing so. I want to predicate an event that I hope will never occur and which must be avoided by all means. What would happen if a French nuclear power station had an incident similar to that at Chernobyl? Would the Government take the view that farmers should sue France in the international court? Would the Government sue France? Would the Government once again provide compensation for farmers?

After the incident at Chernobyl, the fine principle about the polluter having to pay came to nothing and the Government had to set up their own compensation fund. I am glad that they did so, but I want to be quite clear on how much of the philosophy of the 1985 Act must now be jettisoned. An agreement should be established now, so that in any future incident either the principle that the polluter must pay is applied or a compensation fund is made available.

Is there not a case for an international agreement, as wide as possible, to cover such contingencies? Should it not establish the responsibility of national Governments to provide compensation when incidents within their countries contaminate other countries? Are the Government pressing for such an agreement, or is Britain's susceptibility and tenderness on the question of acid rain precluding that?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman's last comment is certainly not true. We are currently discussing these matters with all of the countries involved. I hope that the hon. Gentleman agrees that one important matter is the original notification and details of any accident. The Soviet Union is a closed regime where there is no real public opinion and no real ability to question. Therefore, there is no questioning of the initial placing of a nuclear power station, its building or its safety mechanisms. There are no regular articles in The Guardian discussing how these matters should be handled; there are no Friends of the Earth arguing whether there should even be nuclear power plants.

That is why I made the distinction about the date of the accident and the date when we picked up the information

—we picked it up; we were not told. Our primary concern has been to ensure that a better vehicle for information is established. The Soviet Union has moved some considerable way to meet that objective—as it has had to do under international pressure.

The other issues all predicate upon one point. We have reserved our position on whether the Soviet Union will be required—as it should be if the case is proved—to pay compensation. Whatever comes out of the discussions, whether or not the Soviet Union pays up and whether we have an international agreement, the crucial point for the British farmer is that he knows that compensation is not dependent upon long-winded international discussions. After Chernobyl, the farmers needed to know that compensation would be dealt with immediately.

Mr. John: I entirely accept the right hon. Gentleman's last point. It is a pity that the excessively theoretical approach of the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985 about relying on the polluter paying plus any insurance proved to be the source of a great deal of worry —even in advance of Chernobyl.

Like the Minister, I hope that the Soviet regime—which is showing a more refreshing openness about incidents that previously would have been kept hidden from the international gaze—will feel able to release information on disasters promptly and widely. The sinking of the nuclear submarine is an example of its change of heart, and I hope that that continues. Nevertheless, we need a framework of compensation for the future. The current scheme, although it is comprehensive, is ad hoc. I hope that we and other countries will together consider what can be done for the future.

Although I concede that in the latter stages of the incident the position very much improved, I do not think that the Minister's description of everything having run smoothly at Government level from the start is a fair reflection of what happened. The Government were caught on the hop and there was considerable confusion and chaos. Many lessons were learnt and we must ensure that they are applied in future——

Mr. Gummer rose——

Mr. John: I shall not give way. The right hon. Gentleman made a three-minute intervention in my speech, having already spoken for well over half an hour. He must listen occasionally. He cannot have the last word, the last but one word and the word before that. If he listens he may pick up a scintilla of information that he does not already possess and that might be helpful to him.

The Minister did not take part in the debate on the 1985 Act, so I can tell him that it proceeded very much on the basis that we were discussing a domestic nuclear incident. We discussed areas of land close to nuclear power stations that would be affected. As the Minister conceded, Chernobyl threw up a different position because the contamination came from outside Britain and initially was not specific to any area. The Department of the Environment, which was originally nominated as the lead department, did not handle matters well. One problem was that it did not have the same familiarity as MAFF with procedures for communicating with farmers. I am actually giving the Minister a plug for his Department, so I do not know why he is looking so choleric. When MAFF became the lead Department the position improved. When something happens for the first time, it is a learning process for the future. We are now assessing what happened. Several Departments, along with the National Radiological Protection Board, had unclear remits. In future we must avoid such contradictory and confusing information.

The Government have launched an internal review of procedures that is due to report before the end of the month. Indeed, it may even be on Ministers' desks already. I urge the Minister to publish the report in some suitable form so that the whole country will know the lessons that have been learnt and what we propose for the future. The European Commission recently proposed common European procedures to deal with nuclear accidents. That is superficially attractive, but I do not know whether it is just a pious hope rather than a worked-out scheme. The Government do not appear to be too receptive to the proposal. Will the Minister address himself to that point when he replies and inform us of the Government's attitude to the European proposal?

We have to deal with the time scale. I understand the question of the radiocaesium and the time scale that affects it as opposed to that which affects iodine. However, the contamination reached us on 2 and 3 May, but the order was made on 20 June. That seems a long delay, particularly as there were stories in the press about high radiation levels for about three or four weeks before the order was made. Therefore, we have to ask whether the restrictions could have been made sooner. I assume that the Ministry is satisfied that no contaminated lamb got into the food chain, but nevertheless if restrictions are to be made, the sooner the better in such incidents.

With hindsight, we realise that it would also have been better if the Government had been more frank with the industry when the restrictions were imposed. The idea was given that this was a short-term matter and the situation would soon be back to normal. It would have helped farmers had they known the length of time that the restrictions might have been in effect, because they would have been able to make arrangements to cope better.

The point raised by the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) about how long the order will last is important, and needs to be dealt with. In certain areas, levels are dropping more slowly than had been anticipated, as the Minister said. A number of people have been given a voice by the hon. Member for Caernarfon. They feel that these restrictions will be in existence in some areas well into 1987. The Minister did not answer the question about how long the restrictions would be in place. One always hopes that such restrictions will be short-term and that there will be more amending orders and more farms being taken out of the restriction zones as quickly as possible. We must know whether it is likely that another three, four, five or six months may be involved.

What plans do the Government have if such areas are to remain under restriction for next year? Do they plan anything about the sheep and the effect on grazing areas? There will come a time when the Government will be invited to cut their losses and slaughter and dispose of sheep that are still above the safety limit. Those questions must be answered frankly if we are to know what the future holds. What advice are the Government to give farmers about grazing?

Despite the Minister's talk of alarmism, I must raise what reputable agriculturalists such as Professor John Bryn Owen of Bangor have been raising about the long-term possible genetic effects on sheep. I do not know the truth of this. I was excluded even from O-level classes in biology, never mind the rarified levels in which these debates are conducted. Serious problems are being raised, and the Farmers Weekly carried an item about them recently. I should like the Government to assure me that they will monitor the long-term effects of this kind so that we shall know whether there have been effects. The Minister did not concede that in his encomium of openness. Nothing will be gained by hiding long-term genetic defects and I hope that monitoring will continue.

Contamination of silage affects cattle rather than sheep. Again, the Government have given reassurances that it can safely be fed to animals. I presume from that that the Government are satisfied that no risk is involved. Again, a continuing monitoring process would be helpful.

Compensation is dealt with in three different ways—the original fat lamb scheme, the compensation associated with market release and, now, agreed only on 7 October, compensation for direct losses. The farmers' unions to which I have spoken are reasonably happy with the final package, although on the third element, being paid on a headage basis will mean rough-and-ready justice. It is justified because individual assessment on a farm-by-farm basis would be a difficult and lengthy process.

However, the farmers' unions are critical about the way in which the Ministry has dragged its feet about these matters. First, there was a reluctance to accept that compensation was justified, and then the principle of compensation for direct losses took a long time to agree. As the restrictions impinged on the commercial activities of farmers, and they readily accepted it, should not the Government have responded in the same spirit by offering a realistic compensation package at an earlier stage? I hope that a Government compensation scheme will be clearly in place, and will leave no one in any doubt that, should, unfortunately, people be affected by another such instance, they will be financially indemnified from the consequences.

For how long will compensation provisions continue? Can the Minister give us an assurance that, as long as farmers continue to suffer indentifiable losses as a result of the Chernobyl disaster, they will be compensated for those losses? For example, if it turns out that there are long-term genetic effects, or a loss of fertility, will compensation be paid? That is important.

I hope my speech has not criticised in a partisan way or carped about the deficiencies, but the job of the House is to learn from experience so that the future is better safeguarded. If the Minister answers my questions, we shall have taken some steps towards doing that.

Mr. Simon Coombs (Swindon): I am sure that the House will wish to thank my right hon. Friend the Minister for his exposition. I wish to associate myself with his remarks and those made by the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) in thanking not only the staff for dealing with the emergency when it arose but the farmers who had to bear the brunt. I also express the thanks of the House to consumers, who had a deal to contend with, partly as a result of the campaign in the media which tended towards hysteria, particularly in those portions of the press which rely more on pictures than on words for appeal. The people responded in a placid manner, and that is to be welcomed. Consumers have a voice in this debate and as I represent no farmers I shall speak for them.

I associate myself with many of the remarks made by the hon. Member for Pontypridd, but I rather parted company with him when he referred to chaos and the Government being caught on the hop, and made other remarks that nearly brought my right hon. Friend the Minister to his feet, but he was pushed back. That is not a fair reflection on the way in which the matter was dealt with. The speed with which the Government responded to an emergency that they could never have predicted, far away in the Soviet Union, is a remarkable achievement.

The order relating to England speaks specifically about Cumbria. I want my right hon. Friend the Minister to make it clear that the reason for the place of Cumbria in the order has nothing to do with Sellafield. I mentioned the media's attitude to these matters. Unfortunately, there has been a tendency to hint that the presence of Sellafield in the part of Cumbria which is affected by this order may be the reason for its continuation as a restricted area. That is an unfortunate suggestion, and I hope that the Minister will make it abundantly clear that this order relates only to the after-effects of the Chernobyl disaster, not to any activities by British Nuclear Fuels plc at Sellafield. It has its own problems, and it is right that those problems are clearly dissociated from the problems that we are discussing today.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Mark Robinson): I assure my hon. Friend that that is precisely the case. These orders are limited to the after-effects of Chernobyl.

Mr. Coombs: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for that assurance. It is important that that should be put on the record, because some people will still insist that the opposite is the case. Only by continuing to state that fact can we hope to give the lie to remarks that are sometimes made outside the House.

Mr. Wigley: Do the hon. Gentleman and the Minister accept that we should monitor the total radiation that affects animals? To the extent that radiation from civil nuclear power stations may contribute to that total radiation, as has been shown in the case of the fish in Trawsfynydd lake, it must be taken into account together with anything that comes from Chernobyl.

Mr. Coombs: I am not sure whether my hon. Friend would wish to take responsibility for dealing with that question, which lies well outside his brief, but from my experience and knowledge of the matter, I assure the hon. Member for Caernarfon that that is indeed the case. There is continual monitoring in the area around Sellafield. Indeed, it has been established that if a man were to eat 50 tonnes of whelks from Morecambe bay in one year, he might be slightly ill, but it is hard to say whether it would be as a result of radioactivity or as a result of overeating.

My hon. Friend the Minister has dealt with my first point, and I need not press him for any further comments when he replies to the debate.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of State did not say, when he opened the debate, whether there had been any prosecutions under the orders which are supplanted by those before the House today. It might be helpful to know whether the proposals in the previous orders have had to be put into effect by way of prosecution.

[Mr. Coombs]

I wish to reinforce the remarks of the hon. Member for Pontypridd on compensation and the maintenance by the Government of their efforts to ensure that compensation is considered as an international matter. It cannot be right that the British taxpayer should shoulder the burden for an affair which is in no sense the responsibility of the British Government or people. I am sure that my hon. friend the Minister will give that assurance to the House when he replies to the debate and that the Government will be unceasing in their efforts to ensure that there is adequate compensation, as a matter of international agreement, when this affair comes to an end.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of State said that 4 million sheep were initially affected by the orders, and that the figure is now down to 300,000 sheep. That is to be welcomed, but it would be wrong for the Government to be tempted to remove the restrictions a moment sooner than was safe for the British people, especially in relation to the lamb which they might eat at a later stage. I entirely sympathise with hon. Members who represent the areas seriously affected by the orders, and for their sake I can only hope that the restrictions will be lifted soon. But at a time when it is clear that the orders must continue, at least for the foreseeable future, it would be wrong for hon. Members to press for a commitment which might put the Government in an invidious position later. We are debating public health. Public health must be the paramount consideration for the Government and the House.

It is probably too early to go too deeply into the lessons that can be learnt from the affair, but I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will say whether he believes that lessons can be learnt about the position of lowland areas. Clearly, we shall learn much about the biological impact on the uplands, which will be extremely valuable, but it is important to those of us who represent the bulk of the United Kingdom to know whether similar lessons can be learnt from Chernobyl. I hope that my hon. Friend will comment on that when he replies.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I am glad that this debate is taking place. We have had far too little debate on this serious issue, which has been especially serious in the county of Gwynedd, which is home to a large proportion of the sheep that are still restricted. It is unfortunate that we do not have a larger attendance in the House this morning. I should have though that such a subject would dictate the presence of more than 10 hon. Members, but I am glad that at least one Member from each of the four parties in Wales is in the Chamber, and I am glad that the Under-Secretary of State for Wales will respond to the debate.

I make it clear at the outset that I have not criticised and I do not criticise the Government for introducing the orders. It was necessary to give complete confidence to domestic consumers and those abroad, who are an important part of the sheep market, that the Government would take all the steps necessary to maintain safety for the general public. I also underline the congratulations and thanks that have been given to those who have undertaken considerable hard work over long hours in this matter.

The Minister of State should have given even greater thanks to the farmers than he did, because farmers have abided by the restrictions in a remarkable way, despite the great difficulties that many of them have faced. Not one instance has been reported of a farmer infringing the restrictions. That is something for which they deserve considerable thanks and congratulations. In that context, perhaps they were justified in wanting to know more about what was going on and wanting more coherent information at an earlier date. Although the compensation package is now broadly acceptable — some details still cause problems — even as late as 18 September the National Farmers Union issued a press statement entitled

That shows the uncertainty that existed for several months after the problems arose.

There is also a question about the degree of safety since the Chernobyl disaster. We must not only monitor what has happened at Chernobyl, but must keep a close eye on what happens in our nuclear industry. Some people with a scientific background who are in a position to know suggest that dangers arise from our nuclear industry. We should always bear that in mind.

I am not sure whether we should take the line that the Soviet Union should be taken to court and made to pay compensation. I disagree with hon. Members on both sides of the House about that. The Russian people have suffered enough and have had to pay an enormous price for their suffering. If we continued to say that those who caused the disaster should pay for it and we take the Soviet Union to court, where would we stand in relation to the difficulties that we have caused to the Scandinavian countries because of our contribution to the acid rain problem? I would advise caution on that.

Mr. John: I was merely seeking to point out the inadequacy of the principle that the polluter must pay. I was not advocating a court action. My two points were that there should be Government compensation and an international agreement.

Mr. Wigley: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. It is difficult to enforce the principle that the polluter must pay and we need greater international co-operation on pollution matters, particularly those relating to radioactive pollution. The conference in Vienna on 25 August was satisfactory and open. The delegates from Wales were impressed by the openness shown by the Soviet Union at that conference. We must build on that for the future.

We should not be too complacent about how public health could have been affected by the Chernobyl incident and we ought to note the comments of some people on the scientific side. A New Scientist article entitled "How Ministers misled Britain about Chernobyl", written by Mr. David Webster, who has been an adviser to our Select Committee on the Environment, aroused considerable attention and led to a leading article in the magazine. The leader said:

"While the National Radiological Protection Board was advising the government on the likely health effects of the accident, ministers were making misleading statements to the public . . . Kenneth Baker, the environment secretary, claimed that there would be no risk to health in Britain. Perhaps Mr. Baker does not count 'a few tens' of deaths, the NRPB's first estimates, as a health risk.

When ministers make such stupid statements, is it any wonder that people do not believe them when they claim that it is safe to build nuclear power stations?"

That needs to be put on the record. We should not be alarmist, but nothing will be lost if we admit openly that when there is an increase in radiation there will be greater risks and some people will suffer. That is unfortunate, but it is a matter of fact and we should not try to hide from it.

The NFU briefing to hon. Members on today's debate says:

"the Government must now make clear that the high levels of radio activity measured are exclusively the result of the Chernobyl accident, and not linked to nuclear power stations in the area."

In view of the radioactivity levels in fish to which I referred in an intervention, we need to monitor and identify, as far as we can, what radioactivity is directly associated with the Chernobyl accident and how much is general background radioactivity. If some radioactivity is identified with our nuclear power stations programme that should also be identified. Such a breakdown of information would make it easier for us to have confidence.

The Government clearly did not expect the restrictions to last for so long. I quoted in another intervention the comments of the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Robinson), who suggested that I had made alarmist comments in the debate on 24 July when I referred to reports that the restrictions might have to continue for another six months. In fact, there is every likelihood that the restrictions will continue for another six or nine months. It would be useful if the Government acknowledged that that could be so in some areas.

Figures on radioactivity levels have been published, and the Government figures for Gwynedd a couple of weeks ago referred to 2,200 bq/kg of caesium in lamb. One farmer in my constituency said that he had a level of 4,000 bq/kg on his farm. If it takes 70 to 90 days for radioactivity to halve its intensity, it will take nearly three months for the level on that man's farm to fall to 2,000 bq/kg, another three months to halve to 1,000 bq/kg and nearly another three months to fall to 600 bq/kg, which is the safe level that the Government look for to clear areas. If that is the case, let us be open about it and admit that a limited number of people may be in that position. It would have been much more satisfactory if that had been done at the start.

There have been criticisms about the delays that occurred in the testing for radioactivity. We must avoid that mistake at all costs. We are on new ground and there have been helpful technological developments so that if, God forbid, a similar accident happened in the future, we would be in a stronger position.

There also appear to have been delays in communications between the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Welsh Office in May. Following replies to correspondence after the debate on 24 July, I am far from satisfied, that we were ready to act as quickly as we should have acted in Wales. I do not believe for one moment that the public have been endangered, but we need to examine how we can act more quickly.

I underline, as I do every time that I speak on this subject, that I do not believe that there is any danger to people who eat lamb. Steps have been taken and there is confidence. I encourage the public not to be misled by alarmist stories that suggest that there are dangers in the lamb in shops. I do not believe that.

We need machinery for monitoring live sheep as quickly as possible. If that had been done this year we could have reacted quickly to move animals without causing great difficulties for farmers. There have been difficulties. Some farmers have moved their sheep just before the restrictions were introduced. Some sheep were moved in preparation for being taken to market and I know one farmer who moved his sheep a few miles inland. Those sheep were locked in for weeks.

The traditional pattern in agriculture in Wales is that sheep spend the summer on the high land and come down to the low land in the winter. The Minister of State gave the impression that sheep would remain on the high ground throughout the winter. Many sheep would have been moved for the winter and the fact that that could not be done involved farmers in considerable costs. Many do not believe that they have been adequately compensated for their loss.

Farmers who did not take their lambs to market within three weeks of the ending of the ban are suffering. Many just did not know what to do at that time. They were afraid that markets would be flooded with a glut of animals and were unsure about how things would work out. Some were under other agricultural pressures and did not realise that the three-week period would be critical. It would be unfair if they missed out on compensation.

The Farmers Union of Wales suggested that a buy-up and relocation policy would have prevented many of the problems that occurred. Under such a policy the Government would have bought store lambs from the affected areas, taken them to graze in areas where radiation levels were lower and recouped the money spent on buying lambs and paying for grazing by selling the animals. The Government should have considered adopting that policy. I hope that it will be on the agenda if similar problems arise in the future.

The fat lamb compensation appears to be adequate. The mark and release scheme was introduced to release pressure in other areas, but between 19 and 25 August the system was a shambles. Farmers experienced considerable difficulties. It was 11 September before the situation was put right, following discussions with the Secretary of State for Wales and no compensation has been paid to farmers who suffered from the confusion that arose. That point should be looked into.

I turn to the direct losses. The headage payment had to be accepted not because it was the best way of paying compensation but because assessing the compensation due on an individual basis, which would have been much fairer, would have taken a year to 18 months, and there would have been cash flow difficulties. Thus, there was an element of rough justice, and some people may have missed out.

There is also the allied question of compensation for those farmers who have suffered from the effects of radiation on their silage. The topic was raised earlier, and is obviously directly relevant. The situation has been highly unsatisfactory. Bryn farm in my constituency, three miles from Caernarfon, is farmed by Mr. Peter Sturrock. In late July and early August the level of radiation in the silage was found to be 563 bq/kg. That silage was to be fed to dairy cows which would consume between 40 and 50 kg per day, amounting to between 20,000 and 25,000 bq per head. The farm was initially told that the safety level was 5,000 bq per head per day. In other words, that silage would have contained five times the safe level of radiation. Obviously, the silage was not used to feed the cows. Indeed, a consultant was taken on who worked for five days and who advised the farmer on how to cope.

[Mr. Wigley]

Eventually, about six weeks later, the Welsh Office told the farmer that apparently, as a result of tests done in Germany, the silage was safe and could be used without diluting it by one part in five, as previously advised. But when it was asked whether it was safe to feed dairy cows the silage and to drink the milk there on the farm, as the farmer's familly normally did, there was some hesitancy as to whether it would be safe, undiluted.

Such confusion does not add to confidence. Perhaps the Minister will clarify the situation relating to silage. Why has such uncertainty persisted? A few weeks after saying that the level of radiation was five times too high, how could it be said to be perfectly all right to use? Will the Minister also clarify the reports that employees at the Trawscoed agricultural research centre in Aberystwyth have refused to work with soil because of the level of radiation? Such reports lead to great uncertainty and dissatisfaction, and that does not help anyone.

We must draw lessons from the disaster, so that if there is any difficulty with our nuclear power stations or with those of other countries, we can deal with it more coherently, fairly and quickly. Although a reasonable compensation scheme has been arrived at, we must ensure that those who have missed out because of the rough justice meted out are shown some flexibility. That is necessary if confidence is to be maintained in the industry.

Welsh lamb, in particular, is close to my heart, and I hope that the Government will help to project Welsh lamb and will help the marketing programmes for it so that after this year's hiccups, farmers can look forward to a more confident future, and so put this chapter behind them.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): I support what has been said by the other Opposition Members about the consequences of the Chernobyl disaster, but I must first congratulate officials from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and from the Welsh Office on having worked so hard to establish the facts. A tremendous amount of work was done. Farmers have suffered greviously, but they have adopted a very responsible attitude. They have suffered severely financially and in many other ways, and so they, too, are to be congratulated.

Understandably, farmers have shown great concern from time to time, but we can learn from mistakes in the past so that they do not happen again. When the emergency first arose, officials seemed to be unsure about the working of the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985. They were somewhat muddled in their approach at the beginning. In some parts of north Wales the first three days of restrictions were busy days, because lamb is marketed on Thursday, Friday and Saturday. Sometimes vehicles were not stopped. Indeed, I refute the suggestion that there was no confusion. There certainly was confusion, and there is some evidence that, as a result of the uncertainty about invoking the Act, problems arose.

Many farmers are unhappy about how the boundaries were drawn for restricted areas. The boundaries did not always follow farm boundaries, but often followed roads and streams instead. As a result, holdings were sometimes split in two. On one farm, half of a flock of sheep was inside the restricted area, while the other half was not. Thus, the Welsh Office did not conduct a very confidence-inspiring operation in that regard.

Some farmers have still not received the results of animals slaughtered as long ago as last May or June. That is a very unsatisfactory state of affairs. There is also some evidence that in the initial period there was not very good communication between the Welsh Office and the county emergency planning officers. As time went on, that problem was ironed out, but once again, a lesson can be drawn.

The frontiers of the restrictions on the movement of lamb and sheep were gradually moved back, and that is understandable. But it led to very slow movement and caused some uncertainty. In future, we should be more precise about announcing what is to happen. I know that that is difficult when one is waiting for the results of tests on lambs, but perhaps a more formal method could be worked out for the future.

There is evidence of price reductions of up to 20p per kg for some lamb sold in parts of north Wales. That means a £3 loss per head for a 15 kg lamb. The marking of lambs has also caused problems. I agree with the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) that on the whole the fat lamb compensation scheme is not too bad but the situation affecting marked lambs, and particularly blue marked lambs, gives rise to concern. They are being held until January, and there is some evidence that farmers with cash flow problems have been forced to sell to dealers, even though the lambs cannot be marketed until January. Some of those buying blue marked lambs will make a tremendous profit, because farmers have had to sell them at very low prices. That is unhealthy, as the money should clearly have gone to the primary producers.

There is still a feeling that compensation should have been paid on a weekly basis. The arguments have been exercised as to why, on an individual farm basis, that would have taken a long time to sort out. Perhaps the element of rough justice that has been mentioned must stand in this case.

I ask the Minister whether any lambs were tested in the areas affected before the disaster occurred in early May. If any lambs were tested as a matter of routine, are results available with which we can compare post-Chernobyl results? I do not know whether such work has been done, but it would be useful to know whether it was and whether any information is available.

We in Wales are concerned about the problems of marketing and, in more recent times, the collapse of Welsh Quality Lamb, which was a sad case. There is no doubt that the delay in the marketing of lambs in north Wales must have been a contributory factor in the collapse of Welsh Quality Lamb. Obviously it is difficult to put one's finger precisely on how the disaster affected that organisation, but clearly it did. There may have been a case for the Welsh Office giving direct support to Welsh Quality Lamb to keep it going through a difficult period. The difficulties that exist between the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Department of the Environment have been mentioned.

The orders before us relate to lamb. However, I shall make some general comments as I feel that we have some lessons to learn for the future. I believe that access to information should be automatic and accessible from the start of any like emergency. From some of the comments made this morning, that was not the case in this instance.

There are problems of regional differences and inconsistencies. I believe that tests should take place in all areas —perhaps that was done in this case, but it was not always made clear—and the results should be published over the period of the emergency for all areas so that we can have a factual discussion and some confidence in the results regarding the production of food in unaffected areas. The information published was not clear enough. There needs to be better communication in the form of leaflets as well as the press information that was given out at the time.

I believe that there should be uniform standards throughout the EEC, and perhaps over wider areas than that. There is no doubt that there is evidence that this country's standards are inadequate for measuring radioactivity compared with those of other EEC countries. That needs to be sorted out. On some occasions, co-ordination with local authorities on market restrictions on a regional basis could have been better so that inconsistencies could have been ironed out a little better. Advice for consumers and producers must be concise and informative from the beginning. I have already mentioned the publication of leaflets.

I and many other people are worried about the omission of certain livestock which might be expected to show increased radioactive caesium concentration. For example, at a late stage, fish stocks were identified as a problem area. Perhaps those results were known earlier, but certainly they were not published. That is a worrying matter. Some of the radioactivity levels in fish in the River Conwy were extremely high. I ask whether there have been results from other herbivores in the wild; in other words, were rabbits or hares tested? Clearly, they were also affected by the incident. I am sure that grass samples were tested. They should have been tested — perhaps they were, but we do not know — at different heights of growth, in grazing areas and in grassland.

Mention has been made of the testing of forage and the unknown factors, especially in silage, and even hay, although hay was not badly affected. However, we need better information on silage. Obviously, testing took place on water supplies. That needs to be monitored carefully in future. Milk is well catered for regarding testing, but what about butter, cheese and other milk products made from the milk tested? It was difficult to get blanket testing in this case. We must not forget imports of dairy products from Europe.

There are many lessons to be learnt from the Chernobyl disaster. The farming community has been tolerant. It has suffered seriously financially. Certainly, in terms of cash flow, the incident has been a disaster. There have been problems from a marketing angle. I congratulate those consumers who have stood by lamb as a product and have continued to consume it. They have shown a great deal of sense, and they need our congratulations.

There are many unanswered questions about the incident. We can learn a great deal from it. I hope that in future we shall have a better ordered investigation. I hope that such an incident does not occur again, but we must be prepared for whatever may confront us in future. We must use information wisely and go on our way with confidence.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Mark Robinson): We have had a constructive debate. Hon. Members from all parties have taken part in debating an issue that has been of great concern to three specific parts of the United Kingdom for many months. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State, in opening the debate, gave a detailed background of the chain of events that led to the tabling of the orders. I shall not attempt to repeat that chronological account or to deal with it in terms of the Welsh position except to say that all the steps that he illustrated have been undertaken with equal determination in both Wales and Scotland. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland — the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. MacKay) — is present for today's debate.

When the ban on movement and slaughter of sheep in north Wales was first imposed on 20 June, it affected 5,100 holdings and 2·1 million sheep throughout north Wales. With the most recent lifting of restrictions on 16 October, around 323 holdings and 143,000 sheep are still affected — less than 10 per cent. of the original total. Throughout that difficult period we moved to lift restrictions as soon as we were in a position to do so. As my right hon. Friend said in opening, we will not keep areas still covered by these orders restricted for a moment longer than necessary.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) and others have asked how long the restrictions will continue, and the hon. Gentleman referred to my remarks in the debate that took place on sheep radioactivity on 24 July. The press reports that were flying around at that time were alarmist and suggested that wide restrictions were likely to remain in force for a long time to come, but the events of the summer have shown that those reports were inaccurate. I would not want, however, to say precisely when the final restrictions will be lifted. We are in the business of safety and not that of gazing into crystal balls. As the hon. Member for Caernarfon said, safety has been paramount in the decision to impose restrictions.

The hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) spoke about the procedures of the House. Far be it from me to comment on that, but it would be a sad state of affairs if lengthy procedures were to prevent restrictions being lifted the moment that we were in a position to take that course. Throughout the summer recess we have made announcements that restrictions would be lifted as soon as possible. That has been our response at all times—hence the real change that has taken place since July.

I associate myself with all the tributes that have been paid to the farming community and the farmers' unions, specifically in Wales. They have been involved throughout in consultation processes in respect of compensation and they have done whatever they can to help allay confusion and uncertainty. It is inevitable that both confusion and uncertainty will arise when we find ourselves in the uncharted waters that the Chernobyl incident has produced. The hon. Member for Pontypridd and others have talked about polluters, an issue which I think my right hon. Friend covered in his comments. It is worth reporting that the United Kingdom has reserved its rights in respect of any compensation claims that it might consider making to the Soviet Union. These issues are better discussed in wider international forums so that international agreements can be reached to cover such events in future and more certainty can be introduced than is currently the position.

My hon. Friend the Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs) emphasised the responsible way in which the farming community reacted at a time of great difficulty. It was important to allay confusion as quickly and constructively as we could. There is no point, however, in jumping the gun and providing incorrect information, which only results in making things worse. I can assure my hon. Friend that we shall be examining the lessons learnt from this unfortunate incident. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will take note of the suggestion that we should consider publishing a report of the conclusions when they are ready.

The hon. Member for Pontypridd said that he was reserving the difficult questions for me. He asked a specific question about insurance and asked me to produce figures. I suspect that he knew that I would not be in a position to produce them. Such insurance policies, if they exist, would inevitably be in the hands of private firms and the statistics would not necessarily be easily available. It is unlikely that farmers took out such insurance, even if they knew of its existence. If they had done so in any numbers, we would not have faced the requirement to provide compensation with which we were confronted. That illustrates that the Chernobyl incident resulted from what insurers like to describe as an "act of God", although the Chernobyl instance was perhaps an act of man.

It has been said that there is a need for openness. I can say categorically that in the aftermath of the Chernobyl incident the Government have done everything possible to provide information to the public. I have a weighty folder with me containing all the information that has been presented over the past months to those concerned in Wales, and this information will continue to be presented.

It has been suggested that incidents such as the Chernobyl disaster are seen in isolation, but that is not so. Our regular monitoring processes were in operation before Chernobyl, and the moment that there were readings showing higher levels of radiocaesium in Wales, we intensified the monitoring activities. Those activities will continue and all the information that is gleaned will be analysed so that comparisons can be made post-Chernobyl with pre-Chernobyl and the time of the disaster.

Mr. Geraint Howells (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): Can the Minister say whether lamb consumption is back to normal in Wales and in Britain generally?

Mr. Robinson: The figures show that lamb consumption is at a healthy level, especially when compared with consumption last year. One of the reasons for this is that the Government acted swiftly to reassure the market. Ministers have been at pains in all debates and discussions following the Chernobyl incident to emphasise the importance of convincing the public that Welsh lamb and other lamb is safe to eat and is safe in the food chain. The figures show that that has been a successful exercise.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon referred to a paper by Dr. Webster. The paper is based on some fundamental misunderstandings and serious factual errors. The result is unnecessary alarm. The National Radiological Protection Board has already rebutted publicly the arguments that are advanced in the paper and has issued statements that milk is entirely safe to drink. Our tests show that even peak value levels of radioactivity are well below those at which appropriate action should be taken.

The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) referred to the monitoring of other products, and we have continued the monitoring of agricultural products throughout the recess. The programme has been undertaken throughout the United Kingdom and has not been limited to the areas where we imposed restrictions on the movement and slaughter of sheep on 20 June. The produce tested includes milk and milk products, cereals, vegetables, fruit, game birds and other meats, and the results confirm that all the foodstuffs produced in the United Kingdom are perfectly safe to eat. In accordance with our policy, we have already published and will continue to publish the results of this monitoring programme.

Various hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor, asked about silage. The issue, which was also raised during the summer was whether any problems were likely to arise from feeding silage with levels of radiocaesium to livestock. That was especially a cause for concern in Wales. As part of the general monitoring programme, agricultural Departments carried out a comprehensive testing of silage, particularly in areas of high deposition, to obtain a full picture of the situation. In north Wales about 400 such tests were made. They confirmed that generally first cut silage produced in the higher deposition areas had been the most affected.

The results have shown some variability between samples with the maximum levels found in silage being 854 bq/kg in north Wales, 302 bq/kg in Cumbria and 454 bq/kg in Scotland. Experimental work carried out by the United Kingdom agriculture Departments, including feeding silage with known levels of radiocaesium to dairy cows to assess the uptake in milk, have confirmed that no problems for human or animal health are likely to arise from feeding silage to livestock and there remains no reason to believe that restrictions will be necessary of the feeding of silage to stock.

Mr. Wigley: Can the Minister clarify whether the Government reconsidered their position during August? If a level of 5,000 bq/kg per head per day was the danger level on 30 July for the farm of Bryn near Caernarfon, why was that regarded as safe by early September? Did new information become available?

Mr. Robinson: Throughout the whole Chernobyl incident we have been constantly reviewing our procedures and ensuring that the information that we were receiving was the information that we needed and that it was accurate. That has been our guiding principle. As every item of public concern has been raised, including this one, we have considered it intensively. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that we are satisfied that the results of our research are accurate and that the position is as I have described it in my speech.

Our information is also supported by trials carried out in Germany which involved feeding silage with levels up to 4,000 bq/kg, which is more than four times the levels found in the United Kingdom. The experimental work that we have undertaken and the tests in Germany have shown that, on a daily basis, less than 10 per cent. of the amount of radiocaesium taken in from silage is carried through into milk. The levels of uptake of radiocaesium and radioiodine in milk are well below any level at which any action would need to be considered. The results of our experimental work will be published in due course. I assure the hon. Member for Caernarfon that reports about silage turning blue are not evidence of radio-iodine.

Chernobyl has focused the public's attention on radiation, and people are rightly concerned for their welfare and for the natural environment in which they live. We wish to do everything possible to meet this concern. That is why we shall continue to publish all the data that we have collected. I am sure that the House welcomed my right hon. Friend's announcement in July that he has arranged for the survey of radiation levels in Wales being carried out by the Atomic Energy Research Establishment to be extended to include data obtained after the Chernobyl accident. This survey, commissioned by the Welsh Office in 1984, was designed to establish a baseline of radioactivity in soil, crops and sewage and the extension will make it possible to assess the impact of the Chernobyl emissions upon these. This is a further example of the Government's responsible approach to the matter.

Mr. Coombs: Before my hon. Friend gets too far into his conclusions, will he deal with the two questions that I put to him? The first is about the number of prosecutions, if any, under the orders previously in existence. The second is about what may be learnt by lowland farmers as opposed to upland farmers from the activities since the Chernobyl disaster.

Mr. Robinson: I was coming to my hon. Friend's first point, but I shall gladly answer him now. There have been no prosecutions. That emphasises the highly responsible way in which farmers throughout the United Kingdom have responded to this difficult situation. Regarding the implications for lowland farmers, we shall monitor all the lessons from the incident and see how they should affect our future policies. In that respect we have heard a great deal about how the Government should have blueprints to deal with these incidents, but any disaster of this scale and nature is bound to produce its own set of circumstances. With the best drafting will in the world it is not possible to cover all the eventualities that may arise.

Our discussions on compensation and why the Government did not do earlier all that they have done rightly formed and important part of the debate. Hon. Members asked why the Government did not produce a comprehensive package instead of announcing three separate stages. The need to provide compensation has evolved as the position has developed. When the initial restrictions were announced nobody knew how long they would last. We have been in constant discussions with the farmers' unions and as a result compensation has been agreed. It is already being claimed and the system is working satisfactorily.

I note the point of the hon. Member for Caernarfon that some farmers may feel that they missed out on compensation because they did not claim it on time. Tremendous publicity has been given to each compensation scheme as and when it has been announced. The farmers' unions have done everything in their power to disseminate information. The schemes are hardship schemes and the reason for time limits on them is to encourage farmers facing genuine hardship to come forward as soon as possible. It is always open to the hon. Gentleman to draw our attention to specific cases in which extra hardship has occurred. If he knows of such cases, I hope that he will write to me about them. Our paramount principle is compensation for direct loss, not incidental loss.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon also mentioned the fears at Trawsgoed. I must point out that they were allayed on the day they were expressed. The advice of the NRPB is that trials undertaken there have posed no hazards to the operators undertaking them.

I remind the House that we faced new problems with the Chernobyl fallout which affected many areas. The Government reacted quickly and restrictions were imposed as soon as there was evidence of radioactivity levels in sheepmeat high enough to cause concern, should they enter the food chain. We have continued to test sheep and other agricultural produce. We have published the results of all the monitoring that has been undertaken and will continue to do so in the future.

That has placed a great strain on civil servants in all the agricultural Departments and I would like to pay my small tribute to all who have worked extra hours to ensure that everything has been implemented as swiftly as possible.

We have adopted a flexible approach to permit farmers in restricted areas to move their sheep, while at the same time ensuring that no sheepmeat enters the food chain until it is absolutely safe to do so. We have introduced fair and equitable compensation schemes for producers affected by the restrictions and we have released areas from restrictions as quickly as it is possible so to do. We shall continue to do that.

In this debate hon. Members have emphasised the importance of monitoring the long-term effects. Once again, I say to my hon. Friend the Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs) that I agree entirely with the sentiments that he has expressed. We are already doing that as we shall publish our conclusions.

The measures that the Government have introduced were necessary, and they remain necessary. I have already said that they have successfully maintained public confidence in the sheepmeat in our shops. After the initial reaction, the demand for lamb has remained buoyant and prices for lamb have remained as steady as one could have expected in the general market conditions. Were it not for the action that the Government have taken and for the wholehearted co-operation of the farmers who were affected, the situation could have been very different. I commend the orders to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the Food Protection (Emergency Prohibition) (England) (No. 2) Order 1986 (S.I., 1986, No. 1689), dated 29th September 1986, a copy of which was laid before this House on 30th September, be approved.

Overseas Development

12.1 pm

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Chris Patten): I beg to move,

That the draft International Fund for Agricultural Development (Second Replenishment) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 30th June, be approved.

My I first say how pleased I am to be in a position to move this order today, especially when I had thought that my main appearances at the Dispatch Box this week were going to be during debates on sex education and allied subjects. There is, I am sure, a wise and divine purpose in our affairs. I should also like to say what an honour it is to follow in the footsteps of my right hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Raison). He has made, and will continue to make, we all hope, a significant contribution to development matters. He now has a wider canvas for his honest and thoughtful approach to politics.

As the House will know, IFAD is a specialised agency of the United Nations. In several ways it is unique. It was set up following the 1974 world food conference. It began operations in December 1977. Its main objective is to raise more money, on soft terms, to help developing countries to improve their food production systems and related policies and institutions. Its priorities are to increase food production in the poorest food-deficit countries, and to improve as well nutritional standards among the poorest people in these and other countries. It is the only lending body exclusively concerned with these targets. It has specialised in trying to get aid through to peasant communities, and particularly to women, whose role as farmers and traders is so often neglected.

IFAD is unique in another way, too. It was founded, and it functions, on the basis of a partnership between three distinct groups of countries. Each of them holds one third of the voting power and one third of the board of directors. Category I consists of OECD countries, category II of OPEC countries, and category III covers the non-oil exporting developing countries. Its president is traditionally an OPEC country national. Only category III members are eligible for assistance from the fund. With modest administrative and financial resources, IFAD has in the short time of its existence already put its stamp on rural projects worldwide. Up to the end of last year, 28 Commonwealth countries had received from it loans and grants worth about $635 million since the beginning of 1978.

Because IFAD is a partnership, it has always received its funding from contributions negotiated jointly between category I and category II. It started off for the period 1977-80 with $1,024 million, on a burden-sharing ratio of 57 per cent. from OECD countries and 43 per cent. from OPEC countries. Category III members made further contributions of $19 million. The Western donors had always believed that each group should make equal contributions, as each held an equal stake in the institution. This was resisted by OPEC members and in the end — a triumph for pragmatism — a compromise was struck.

The first replenishment of the fund was meant to cover the period 1981-83. This had to be extended as its start was delayed. There were again arguments between category I and category II members about the right balance in their relative contributions. These were hard to resolve. Agreement was eventually reached early in 1982 for a replenishment of $1,100 million, in the ratio of 58 per cent. OECD and 42 per cent. OPEC. Category III members contributed $30 million.

Negotiations for the new second replenishment began in July 1983. They were even more difficult and prolonged. Category II members continued to challenge the concept of the comparative levels of contributions. They also argued that their reduced economic circumstances—the price of oil was falling—justified a smaller share of the funding. Category I members held to their original view that funding should be evenly shared between the two groups. The delay meant that IFAD's resources had to be stretched out again to cover a much reduced regular lending programme in 1985 and part of 1986.

In the end, agreement was reached at the fund's annual meeting in January this year for a replenishment of $460 million, of which $276 million will come from OECD countries and $184 million from OPEC, which is a ratio of 60:40. On top of this, category III countries have pledged about $24 million.

The fall in IFAD's core funding has been dramatic and very disappointing, but its effects will be much reduced if donor members ratify their agreement and make payments promptly. The money will then be committed over two years or so, to the end of 1988, instead of over four years. However, it is very clear that things cannot go on like this. All members have therefore agreed, under section IV of the governors' resolution on the second replenishment, that the president should report to the governing council on IFAD's future financial base. The president has set up a high-level expert group to examine all the relevant issues. I understand that its report will be submitted to the next governing council in December. We then expect to give our initial reactions to its proposals and to take part in detailed discussions over the following months.

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): My hon. Friend mentioned the 58 per cent., now 60 per cent., that is contributed by OECD countries. The OPEC countries claimed that, because of the fall in the price of oil, their contribution should be lower. Their claim was successful. During the next round of negotiations, can the House be assured that discussions will take place not only on the OECD and OPEC contributions to IFAD but also on the proposition that they should be regarded as part of the total overseas aid contributions of individual OECD and OPEC countries? That would reassure many people who feel that the OPEC countries should be playing a much greater part in overseas aid generally, if not through IFAD in particular.

Mr. Patten: I am sure that my hon. Friend's point will be raised in future discussions, together with a number of other proposals—for example, the further fragmentation of IFAD's activities, a point to which I hope to be able to return later.

The discussion that will be taking place from next December will be crucial to the future and to whether IFAD can still realise the original vision of its founders.

The draft statutory order authorises the Secretary of State to pay the British contribution to the new replenishment. If Parliament approves this order we shall contribute over £9 million, which is equivalent to over $13 million at the agreed exchange rate. Our share of the total OECD contribution remains the same as for the last replenishment, that is about 4·8 per cent. We intend to pay in three instalments, by depositing non-interest bearing promissory notes. The first of the notes has to be deposited within 30 days of our instrument of contribution coming into effect, the second on the anniversary of the entry into effect of the replenishment, and the last by 31 December 1987. We expect them to be encashed over a period of years from about January 1989. The arrangements include provision for other countries to modify their contributions pro rata if one or more donors fail to meet their obligations in full.

To help keep IFAD going while we are waiting for ratification by the necessary number of other contributions, I have decided to release our first year's tranche for commitment as an advance contribution under paragraph 7 of the governors' resolution.

IFAD's special programme for Africa was proposed last year, in the wake of the famine, at a time when finalisation of the replenishment itself was still in doubt. But it was only launched formally this January. It is being financed by pledges which are entirely voluntary, rather than negotiated. Although it has a target of $300 million, only $40 million—already contributed—was needed to start it off. It is restricted to the 24 countries most liable to drought and desertification. It is not financing famine relief, but longer-term development, designed to improve the self-reliance of those it helps. In fact, these activities are practically indistinguishable from IFAD's regular programme in such countries.

Special programmes or trust funds of that kind pose dangers, as I am sure the House will understand, to the integrity of the institutions to which they are attached. They encourage the risk of eventual fragmentation into a range of funds contributed for restricted areas, or restricted purposes, distorting the overall priority which each institution or recipient ought to preserve. They are more costly to administer. As time goes on, donors tend to put more and more money into such funds and less and less into core programmes. We have seen this over the last few years, for example, with the United Nations development programme which has not grown nearly as much as special purpose funds in the United Nations development system.

In the case of IFAD, a voluntary fund of this kind and size also poses clear dangers to the whole system of negotiated contributions, on which the institution is founded. So far, though several Western donors have promised contributions, not one OPEC country has made a pledge to the special programme for Africa. Our own policy is therefore to make contributions to such funds only in very exceptional circumstances.

What is more, we have been giving increasing emphasis to agriculture and food production in our own bilateral programme over the past two years. In 1985 our bilateral aid to agriculture and related activities in Africa totalled £92 million, of which some 90 per cent. went to sub-Saharan countries where the need is greatest. Recent allocations include new commitments of £10 million to the western savannah project in Sudan, and £10 million for rural development in Zimbabwe. We also support research into tropical agriculture through the Overseas Development Administration's scientific units, the Plant Breeding Centre and the international agricultural research centres. In our bilateral programme, we are placing increasing emphasis on long-term agricultural development, and, of course, much of the assistance that we provide in this area has for a number of years been in the form of grants, not loans. It is also reasonable to point out that we make substantial contributions to other multilateral programmes for helping Africa and its agriculture. We are committing £75 million to the World Bank's special facility and £800 million to the latest instalment of the European development fund, much of it for Africa, and, of course, much of it going to agriculture.

Nevertheless, IFAD does face exceptional problems. And there is an obvious need to boost what we are all doing to revive African food production — a point widely recognised outside and inside the House—at a time when so many African Governments have pledged themselves to very far-reaching reforms in their agricultural policies and institutions. I have therefore decided, in addition to our replenishment contribution, to offer IFAD £7 million, or some $10 million, towards the African special programme. This amount, which is more or less what Germany and the United States are at present considering making available, is rather more than we should have expected to pay had the special programme been part of the total replenishment. I am sure that that news will be welcome on both sides of the House.

In making our offer we shall reiterate our very strong concern that the special programme should be incorporated into IFAD's core programme again when the third replenishment comes to be put in place, since we do not believe that it ought to be a permanent and separate operation. I hope the decision to contribute to this special programme will be seen, as it should be, as a reaffirmation of our commitment to strengthening the development of agriculture in the Third world, and particularly in Africa —a commitment manifest in our substantial bilateral and multilateral contributions.

I commend the draft order to the House in the conviction that its approval will help IFAD to continue its profoundly important work, with the full support of the British Government and people.

12.8 pm

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): I congratulate the Minister on his appointment to the important post of Minister for Overseas Development. He comes from a good intellectual stable. Indeed, he almost provokes me to make that remark by wearing the badge of it around his neck and having shared it with him it is a pleasure to see him across the Dispatch Box.

I trust that the Minister will be able to make a major contribution to a change in Government policy towards not only agricultural development but other aspects of development policy. Labour Members would be glad to have the assurance that he will be seeing the Prime Minister a little more often than his predecessor did, and that the fight for development, which in one sense he has started today with his contribution to the special fund, will be continued with a challenge to the downward trend of overseas development assistance as a share of the gross domestic product and a reversal of the cuts in the programme which the Government have taken.

It is important that the IFAD special fund should be supported and we are glad that the Government have been able to come into line with the contributions which have been made by other countries such as Japan, West Germany and others. The question is whether the resources will be enough and whether they can at this stage, in any meaningful sense, offset the fall which has taken place so far in IFAD's core funding.

The Minister referred to the fact that not one OPEC country was prepared to contribute to the special programme. That is hardly surprising. The fall in the oil price is devastating enough for this Government's economic policy. But this is a diversified developed economy and most of the OPEC countries are not. Therefore, their resources are more constrained by the fall in the oil price than are those of the other OECD donor countries.

Mr. Chris Patten: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will recognise that the negotiations about the replenishment have been going on for some time and began well before the more recent and substantial fall in the price of oil.

Mr. Holland: I recognise that, but in his statement the Minister mentioned the massive fall in the original target for funding. That cut is not offset even by the special fund contributions. We must take that into account in our evaluation of the Minister's statement.

Earlier this year the Foreign Secretary, in his speech to the special session of the General Assembly on the economic situation in East Africa, said:

"For too many years too little attention has been paid to the most basic need, the production of food. Africa needs adequate, reliable and cheap supplies. Africa has the capacity to feed itself. Yet in Africa hunger persists in many places. That should be an affront to our consciences."

The Foreign Secretary claimed that the short-term situation had improved, but in reality it has not. The short-term position has become worse.

Let us examine the underlying trend and consider the growth in per capital food output in the 24 low-income countries in Africa to which IFAD's contribution is most relevant. Only five of those countries have a negative food growth output in the 1960s but now 18 countries have a negative food output. That is three and a half times the 1960s level.

Of the total African countries, only 10 had negative growth in the 1960s whereas today 28 have negative growth. That is a threefold increase. That increase in terms of need is not reflected in the Government's overall strategy to African agriculture.

The point was well put by Shahid Javed Burki, the director of the World Bank's international relations department in a paper which he presented in Harare. He said:

"The reason for pessimism concerns the prospects of the increasing domestic output of food in the more vulnerable parts of Africa."

Mr. Burki does some simple arithmetic, taking the poorest among the poor countries—Ethiopia, Malawi, Tanzania and Uganda. Between 1978 and 1980 those countries produced 14 million tonnes of cereal equivalent which was equal to 80 per cent. of the World Health Organisation requirement. At that level of domestic output, mass starvation would have occurred, so the countries imported 500,000 tonnes of food, equivalent to 5 per cent. of their export earnings. Mr. Burki asks what would happen in the 1990s. If the population increases by 3 per cent. per annum and if food output also increases by 3 per cent., in 1990 they will produce a total of 19 million tonnes, leaving an import balance of 6 million tonnes to avoid famine. That level of importation would be equivalent to 50 per cent. of their projected export earnings.

Thus contributions from the special IFAD fund at a reduced level are simply not enough. They do not take account of the underlying facts and the difficulties of agricultural food production within increasing population growth in several of the poorest countries, not only in Africa but in the rest of the world. Nor do they take account of the overall crisis in sub-Saharan Africa caused by increasing interest rates on debt and falling commodity prices.

That argument was well put by Professor Reginald Green, who is now attached to the university of Sussex. He stresses that, in the 1980s,

"sub-Saharan Africa is characterised by low and falling GDP per capita, rising debt service requirements, declining import capacity and current account deficits. This has resulted in Draconian import cuts leading to what can only be described as import strangulation."

During the period, the terms of trade have massively worsened for these agricultural exporting countries. The estimates made by Mr. Aqarwala for the World Bank are of a deterioration in terms of trade of about 10 per cent. Other estimates, which I believe to be more realistic, reckon that the terms of trade have worsened in recent years by as much as 25 per cent. This means a fall in revenue from export earnings for cash food products combined with a rise in interest rates on the debt.

Until we address the question of IFAD's special contributions in that wider context, its measures will be remedial rather than enable African countries to restructure their underlying agricultural problem.

The issues addressed by IFAD, including the role of women in agricultural development, are welcome. One of IFAD's better features is that it takes its involvement in agricultural development seriously and can go beyond the formal provisions in the Lomé convention so that women can apply directly for agricultural development funds.

In East Africa, on average, women work 40 per cent. more than men but are paid 60 per cent. less. That sexual inequality is recognised. Credit should be given where credit is most due — to women and to women's agricultural co-operatives. Co-operative forms of agricultural development should be supported.

Mozambique has recently experienced a political tragedy which has aggravated the crisis in that front-line state. It has horrendous problems with agricultural development. One of the reasons why the United States Administration is not prepared to give full backing to IFAD is because of IFAD's agricultural development programmes as reflected in Mozambique where the strategy is that of communal village projects for agricultural development or of agricultural extension projects. A communal strategy is necessary, not for ideological reasons, as the United States believes, but because it is the way to provide schools and health posts to serve rural populations on a communal basis. The United States has been giving aid to the small private farmers in Mozambique but has been refusing to support the communal development programme. This is the kind of area where IFAD can play an exceptional role. The tragedy is that the role it is playing is offsetting the negation of public intervention in agriculture on the United States' own support programmes.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Can the hon. Gentleman tell us the extent to which the internal political instability in some of these countries is directly related to their problems? Both sides of the House acknowledge that those countries have severe internal intrinsic problems in agriculture and that if they were to address themselves to improving political stability, they could solve a great number of the problems that the hon. Gentleman describes.

Mr. Holland: I am glad that the hon. Member has asked that question, because it enables me to tell him that the political instability in the front-line states is caused minimally by themselves and to the maximum extent by destabilisation from South Africa. That is well seen, even in the question of how the plane carrying Samora Machel fell out of the sky. It has been estimated in the front-line states that the cost to them of destabilisation of their domestic development by South Africa has been running at $2 billion to $3 billion a year. The indirect cost to their own joint economic cooperation through SADCC and the SADCC conference, even assisted by the Nordic countries, has been massive. If the United States were to play the role that it should be playing in relation to South Africa and if the Reagan Administration were to put their weight behind the sort of view that we have recently seen in the United States Congress, we might get more political stability in the region as a whole and have a chance for a real agricultural development.

Another point is implicit in that which the hon. Member for Stafford said. One of the limitations about the World Bank approach is born-again marketeering, which we see not from Burki's international division within the World Bank, but from its economics division. The United States Administration assumes that only market forces can achieve agricultural development. [Interruption.] Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like to get to his feet rather than make his point from a sedentary position. That is the emphasis that is being given.

I shall not detain the House by outlining the emphasis given to it in the Foreign Secretary's statement during the debate in the UN special session. The fact is that agricultural producers are on the margins of existence and cannot possibly hope to cope with falling commodity prices and high interest rates. Farmers in rural areas are being crucified by the higher debt costs to their countries. They cannot sustain their indigenous agricultural development programmes against a background of falling commodity prices.

The whole cash crop export system is in question. We should not be surprised at that because of the problems of drought. But drought alone would not have caused famine in so many African countries if there had been sufficient support programmes in rural areas to sustain many of the farmers over a period of shortage of rain. Several of us in the House are interested in these issues and are well aware that even in a full drought period a tropical rainstorm can occur. It can last several minutes and bring down tonnes of water which rush down the rivers or the wadis and escape into the soil, simply because steps to provide such basic measures as coffer dams and catchment areas have not been taken. These are the most elementary programmes that can be undertaken to retain water over the long term.

Such problems are being addressed by IFAD. The Minister's declaration of his willingness to support the special fund is welcomed by the Opposition. It brings us into line with other OECD countries, but does so at a far lower level of overall finance than should be the case. The Minister spoke about the way in which the Government have supported overall agricultural development in Africa through their rural development assistance programmes. Overall, the aid allocations have declined from £10 million per annum in 1980 to a much lower average level. Of the £95 million emergency food for Africa programme undertaken by the Government for famine relief, only some £9 million was new money.

The Minister tells us that the Government are giving increasing attention to tropical agricultural support and to the tropical seeds research institutes. It is a pity he has been so badly briefed in this matter. If he had been able during the Recess to read some of the debates in the House, he would have seen that there exists on both sides of the House the gravest anxiety about the cuts his predecessor undertook in that area. If he increases programmes which are already down to less than £1 million or £2 million, then in terms of the needs of Africa as a whole, he might as well be multiplying zero by zero.

A further point in the case for supporting IFAD and one which the Minister has not stressed are the benefits that such action gives to British industry and employment. The point was made by Mr. Jazairi when he was in Britain and saw groups of hon. Members and some individual hon.Members. It is clear that more than 70 per cent. of the United Kingdom's global share from dispersements under IFAD projects has been achieved in sub-Saharan African countries and that more than 85 per cent. of this has resulted only from procurement in projects financed in countries selected for the special programme. To put it simply, the United Kingdom gets back £2 in orders for every £1 it puts into IFAD. That parallels the position stressed by the Sport Aid commercial that the BBC would not run—"Bury the debt and not the dead"—whereby Africa is actually paying back £3 to £4 for every £1 that it receives either in capital contributions or through aid programmes.

I wish to raise a specific and concrete issue concerning agricultural development and disease. Following the drought, the Horn of Africa faces a real problem from locusts. On 21 October, the Minister said that the Government were giving £2·5 million of British aid for locust control and spelt out where that would go. We welcome that special contribution, but are not sure that it is enough. There is a special problem in the Horn of Africa and one of the regions most afflicted by drought is Tigré; the Minster must address himself to that.

The locust invasion has come from outside Tigré—from Eritrea, Sudan and the Arabian peninsula. However, there is an extensive breeding area for the rest of the Horn of Africa now in eastern Tigré, especially in the Danakil plains. The swarms have now reached the hopper stage and are doing extreme damage to pasture lands and crops in the area. Once they begin swarming, they will do untold damage to pasture lands and crops throughout Tigré, Wollo, the rest of Ethiopia ad Eritrea and could also spread to the Sudan.

Because of the political position in Ethiopia—I am sure that the Minister is following my argument closely—the reality is that the Dergue is not allowing the spraying of crops in Tigré in line with the spraying programmes taking place elsewhere. The only weapons at the disposal of the Relief Society of Tigré are sticks and branches. It has no pesticides or equipment to launch its own protection operation. The society has made a statement to me, in which it says:

"If no measures are taken within this month the consequences will be worse than the recent famine. People and animals will again start dying within a few months, as they ave no reserves whatsoever to fall back on. Those who survive will once more trek in their hundreds of thousands to Sudan."

What the society asks is what we ask — that the Government will make the strongest possible representations to the Dergue in Ethiopia that such a spraying programme be undertaken. Given the urgency of the matter, I hope that the Minister will make that commitment from the Dispatch Box today. If the spraying programme is undertaken, the Relief Society of Tigré has given an assurance that it will

"co-operate with any measure taken to save crops and lives."

If the Minister ignores this matter, he may find that it hangs around his neck for the remainder of the relatively short time that he holds his office — [Laughter.] The hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) may laugh, but this is precisely the sort of advance warning of a real tragedy and pest problem in the Horn of Africa that was given to the House about drought during the past two or three years. We had advance warning that, unless this Government, with other Governments, did something through multilateral action about the railway from Port Sudan to Darfur province, the railway would break down and the relief could not get through. The hon. Gentleman does not do himself justice. If this House does not address such issues, it is not fulfilling its role.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): I made a speech in the House about the railway. I am not laughing about the serious problem of locusts in the Horn of Africa. I wrote to my hon. Friend the Minister two months ago to ask what we could do, and he will no doubt tell us the figures to show how we have contributed to try to offset those difficulties. However, I am laughing at the hon. Gentleman's suggestions that the Dergue Government and Ethiopia will take any notice of a letter written by my hon. Friend. I suspect the Dergue Government of using the locust and food problems in Tigré to starve those wretched people into submission. I am laughing at the futility of writing that letter. I am also laughing at the suggestion that my hon. Friend will not be long in his office. I hope he is there for a long time, because overseas development will benefit enormously.

Mr. Holland: That intervention is depressing. It means that, faced with such a tragedy, the Government cannot take the multilateral action that the Minister says is the best action in such circumstances. If the hon. Gentleman is right, all we have is talk, talk, and talk again when what we need is action to offset the drought, deprivation, crop disease and death afflicting the Horn of Africa. Will the Minister rise to the challenge? He has been told that he has been sent to the salt mines and, quite rightly, he rejected that. Those of us concerned with development do not consider ourselves to be either in the salt mines or the Siberian power station. We are in the potential power station for global development. What greater challenge can any Minister wish?

However, how will the Minister face up to the challenge and how will he deliver? In the case of the Sudanese railway, which collapsed with such disastrous consequences, putting so many lives at risk, the Minister's predecessor said that we had to work through multilateral agencies and bring our EEC partners with us, because these things take time. However, were this Minister to make available light aircraft flown by our pilots to spray the crops it would be relatively difficult for the Dergue Government to oppose such an operation, certainly with the kind of aircraft it has at its disposal, which are baroque, over-developed technology MiG fighters flying at high altitudes that could have difficulty swatting a light plane.

Why does not the Minister use his imagination? I said that to his predecessor in the case of the Sudan debt crisis. I told him not to play around with the multilateral agencies and that if he wanted to make a mark on behalf of not only his party but the House and the British people, he should cut the Gordian knot and, instead of waiting for multilateral pressure, do something himself. I pointed out that we are a shipping and oil-producing nation, while the Sudan has tremendous problems with fuel and its distribution. I suggested that he should commission a tanker, fill it with fuel and send it to Port Sudan, and then send the bill to the EEC Commission. In the case of the locust crisis in the Horn of Africa, why does not the Minister immediately get on to the Ministry of Defence and ask about the technical feasibility of getting our light aircraft there? They could easily be transported from Port Sudan and start proper spraying.

Mr. Cash: Has not my hon. Friend the Minister, in the short time that he has been in the Ministry, already taken a significant initiative in relation to the European Community? I speak as one who is on the Select Committee on European Legislation, who has noticed this. My hon. Friend's initiative was extremely important, having regard to the utter condemnation by the Court of Auditors about the way in which the EEC Commission operated as regards the food crisis in Africa last year and the year before. My hon. Friend has already taken a significant initiative and deserves congratulations, not strictures.

Mr. Holland: The hon. Gentleman mistook my opening remarks. I have a high regard for this Minister. I saw him when he came to university, bright-eyed and bushy-tailed, to start his undergraduate course. It was an excellent intellectual stable, and I am only sorry that the Minister left by the wrong political door. I am challenging, encouraging and urging the Minister to be serious about this.

Such action has been taken before in the drought crisis of the early 1970s, when my right hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale (Dame J. Hart), who was then Minister for Overseas Development, got conflicting reports about the nature of the drought in sub-Saharan Africa in Chad, Niger, Mali and Upper Volta, as it then was. She sent me out to see what was going on and make a recommendation in a report. We came back with a simple finding. We needed four-wheel-drive, five to 15-tonne vehicles to get the food out to the areas where the drought was biting hardest and to avoid people having to come to main distribution centres to get the food.

The Minister will have difficulties if he tries to replicate what my right hon. Friend did. No such four-wheel-drive vehicle was to be had on the market. My right hon. Friend got on to the Ministry of Defence and said, "Can you let me have those vehicles?" The Ministry said, "We cannot spare them." She said, "I will buy them from you at face value. I will replace them if you will let me have them." The result was that, within a few days, those vehicles were being driven across the Sahara to help with the food aid problem.

That is the sort of challenge which the Minister faces in relation to the locust problem in the Horn of Africa. I hope that he will fulfil the promise that he has shown and our high expectations of the role that he can play for development. I hope, especially, that he will start not only with the good measure which he has taken in terms of the contribution to the special fund for IFAD, but by tackling the problem of locusts and crop disease in the Horn of Africa.

Mr. Colin Moynihan (Lewisham, East): I, too, warmly welcome my hon. Friend the Minister to his new Department. I am sure that he will live up to the high expectations held by hon. Members on both sides of the House. If his tenure is short-lived, I hope that that will be due to promotion to the Cabinet in the not-too-distant future, to which he would bring the great advantage of experience of overseas development. That could only be for the good.

I also welcome my hon. Friend's initiatives to date, especially on the special fund. It is vital that we do more for agriculture in our bilateral assistance and our multilateral programmes. To date, I regret that we have been lax on this. To that extent, I agree with the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland). About 24 per cent. of the amount that we give to multilateral agencies goes to agriculture while, as the excellent report written last year by the all-party parliamentary group on overseas development shows, aid to agriculture represents marginally less than 30 per cent. of our total bilateral assistance. That is far too small a proportion when the main challenge in development is assisting recipient countries to develop suitable agriculture — not high technology taken off shelves from western Europe, but suitable technology for them to develop the agriculture best suited to their development programmes and needs.

To that end, I hope that the Minister realises the importance of increasing, not decreasing, United Kingdom manpower to assist in agriculture, especially in Africa. Regrettably, over the years, there has been a major reduction in manpower aid to agriculture in Africa and, indeed, to Africa as a whole. The figures speak for themselves — from 7,402 in 1972 to 4,242 in 1977 and down again to only 1,782 people in 1982. We must reverse that trend to assist the development of agriculture in Africa.

I am delighted that, through the special fund, we shall have an opportunity to increase the proportion of money that we disburse to agriculture, because that sector provides one of our biggest challenges. I am sorry that this has not been mentioned in more depth so far. What we give in aid with one hand we are massively taking away with the other through iniquitous agricultural protection by industrialised countries. Many developing countries have internal political problems that are to the detriment of development, but in developing countries that do not have internal political crisis, development programmes are put in jeopardy as a result of agricultural protectionism in the industrialised world.

Many of these countries are involved in sugar production. Although it is not relevant, perhaps I should declare an interest as I have had a long association with Tate and Lyle. European Community farmers received 18 cents a pound for sugar in 1985. That sugar was dumped on the world market at 5 cents a pound, but the Community continued to buy imported sugar at 18 cents a pound. That sort of subsidy is iniquitous because there is a marginal and comparative advantage for countries in the developing world to produce cane sugar. The United States Government give massive subsidies for irrigation and land clearance projects and then pay farmers not to grow crops on that land. That is another example of subsidisation.

IFAD is in many respects the equivalent of the World Bank's International Development Agency, which works for the poorest countries in the world. The IFAD works in agriculture for the poorest nations and, particularly through its special programmes, for the countries most affected by the sub-Saharan famine.

I hope that the challenge of agricultural problems in sub-Saharan Africa will be taken up following the replenishment and that IFAD will go from strength to strength. Sub-Saharan Africa has the highest birth rate in the world, at 3·2 per cent. The population will double in 22 years and quadrauple in 44 years. The population of Ethiopia in 1950 was 18 million; by 2025 it will be 106 million. The population of Nigeria was 40·6 million in 1950; by 2025 it will be 295 million. The population of sub-Saharan Africa, where the special fund will be most important, is 363 million; by 2025 it will be 1·2 billion.

Even the most optimistic growth rate for agricultural development in sub-Saharan Africa — 2·5 per cent. per annum over the next two decades — will not keep up with the projected population increase. That means that there will be even more malnutrition and that the punishing years of famine will become even more frequent unless we take up the challenge of assisting in these areas of development. Those are the facts and the challenges that IFAD must face.

As I said in a sedentary intervention during the speech of the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland), I see more care and attention, not less, being given by IFAD and the World Bank to, among other things, the solutions that the hon. Gentleman mentioned. During part of the summer recess, I worked as a consultant to the World Bank, concentrating on the medium-term economic growth programme for Bolivia, a country with which IFAD is closely involved, and examining its development problems. Much more emphasis is being placed on women in development programmes. That is a vital area which has been overlooked in the past, not least in Africa where women do most agricultural work but take up too few of the training places in colleges. Back in the fields they are much more significant than the ratio of men and women in the colleges would suggest.

Mr. Stuart Holland: I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman is pleased that he is giving advice to Bolivia. I trust that the Bolivians are just as pleased.

In terms of the World Bank's economic philosophy and what it is doing, it is not simply a matter of reading the most recent World Bank report, which is a paean of praise for market forces from beginning to end and is one of the most disreputable documents ever published by the World Bank. We must also consider the role played by the Anne

[Mr. Stuart Holland]

Kriegels and the Lals of the economic division, who are born-again marketeers. They advocate market solutions for countries where they are irrelevant. They export the south-east Asian model to sub-Saharan Africa, which is about as relevant to the needs of the real world as astrology is to astrophysics. The World Bank should not be operating like that. I trust that the hon. Gentleman has remedied the situation in Bolivia, but it would be a good idea if the World Bank changed its approach too.

Mr. Moynihan: I strongly disagree with the hon. Gentleman and would love to have a lively debate on that point, but I cannot do so now. The economics division has projected market forces as an important concomitant to the sort of approach that I have been pursuing and considerable attention is being given to it in the projects department. It represents appropriate technology and is working well in the agriculture sector in respect of colonisation programmes, as they are called in south America, smallholder schemes, and so on. Such work, along with credit programmes for rural farmers, is important. I am delighted to report that it is now being actively pursued by the World Bank. I hope that more will be done, as it represents an important part-solution to the problems of agriculture in the developing world.

Perhaps I can underpin my remarks by explaining why I believe IFAD is an appropriate vehicle for development. Before I became a Member of Parliament, I worked with that body and I know at first hand just how efficient it is in the implementation of programmes and in its operations. It is not a fat and over-bureaucratised organisation, as some might argue that UNESCO is. Thus, it is inappropriate to say that it is inefficient or in need of modernisation. It is a very efficient tool.

IFAD also addresses the medium and long-term processes of structural reform in agriculture. It recognises that the productive capacity of smallholders must be rehabilitated. The question is how that is to be achieved. It is argued by IFAD that extension services should have a greater role and that their credibility should be enhanced. It is also argued that credit services should be allowed to work with and through the private sector, and that much more emphasis should be placed on traditional agricultural production. In other words, one should be looking for market opportunities for such products of sub-Saharan Africa as cassava, millet, sorghum, and yam. It is argued that they should be developed, rather than concentrating—as other bilateral donors have done—on crops that are primarily geared to export, such as wheat, rice and maize.

Thus IFAD is looking at traditional agricultural production. As it is one of the few agencies to concentrate on that, we should support it. But it has also turned its attention to small-scale irrigation schemes which are appropriate in sub-Saharan Africa. That is important, because world-wide there are too many examples of very large-scale irrigation projects that have not necessarily benefited their recipients. Small-scale irrigation projects, including the provision of wells, are an important feature. I am glad that IFAD has concentrated on them, as they are conducive to agricultural development.

I am also pleased that IFAD has concentrated on soil conservation and on the problems of soil fragility and of conservation-based agriculture. Every year, the world loses a billion trees. Consequently, it is important that we should have at least one major international lending agency that concentrates on conservation-based agricultural policies. IFAD does that, and I welcome it.

One of the great advantages of the Minister's decision to support the special fund is that it will act as a snowball and countries sitting on the fence regarding possible donations to the special fund will come forward and support it as strongly as it should be supported. Unless decisions have overtaken my knowledge, I understand that Australia, New Zealand and Canada have been hesitant about joining the fund. Now that the message has gone out from this House on the special fund, I hope that it will receive further support from those countries and others that have yet to make a decision. In that sense, today's announcement is especially important and appropriate.

In conclusion, I shall give an example of one project that I know well and on which IFAD has concentrated in Bolivia. It is an innovative project. It is recognised that in agricultural extension it is important for the beneficiaries actively to participate in the implementation and planning of projects. Too many projects around the world are imposed on communities without involving them in the initial decision making, planning and project preparation. I welcome the fact that IFAD has taken that initiative and has set up a model project in Bolivia which has had quite remarkable success.

The dispersal of agricultural credit to beneficiaries has already exceeded the original target. A total of 130,000 new plants are growing in an afforestation effort. I mentioned earlier the importance attached to afforestation projects by IFAD. More than 50 fish breeding ponds are in operation. Similar increases in Bolivia have resulted in crops, and incomes have resulted from many other projects of a similar nature in other countries.

It was seeing that project and the work done in Bolivia during the summer that led me strongly to urge the Government to support the special fund. I am delighted that I have not been put in the embarrassing position, as a PPS who is meant to be rigidly attached to the party line, of arguing strongly for this additional income for the fund. I must say that this was somewhat unexpected when it was announced at the Dispatch Box, but if it is a portent of what is to come from my hon. Friend the Minister, I strongly welcome his presence in the House for such debates and I wish him every success in future.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): I congratulate the Minister for Overseas Development on his appointment and the well-deserved tribute he paid to his predecessor, the right hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Raison). However, I thought that the tribute was a rather back-handed criticism of his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister for sacking someone with such an honest and thoughtful approach to politics.

I draw the Minister's attention to a minor error in the draft order. It is an error that rankles with me and, I hope, all hon. Members. There is a spelling error in the draft order which is unforgivable from any Government Department. The spelling of the adjective in the phrase is incorrect. It should have read "principal". That should have been changed before the order was laid.

"one of Her Majesty's principle Secretaries of State"

The IFAD position, as the Minister described it, is not at all good. While one welcomes his contributions to the special fund, one must bear in mind that a vastly reduced amount of money will go to agriculture, especially in Africa, through IFAD as a result of the reduction in contributions by OPEC members. The figures that I have been provided with suggest that the total will be only $460 million compared with $1,100 million previously. Any such reduction in the present state of agriculture, especially in Africa, is to be deplored.

One good thing about the second replenishment for IFAD is that it takes place against a change in perception on the part of Governments in Africa about the importance of agriculture in their economic development and economic growth and the fact that many of the policies pursued in the past have not contributed to the welfare of the rural economy or the growth of agricultural production.

I shall quote briefly from the document which the African countries prepared for the United Nations special session on Africa earlier this year. They stated:

"A substantial raising of the level of productivity in all sectors, particularly in agriculture, is the sine qua non for putting the African economies on the road to development."

"In any programme of action for African recovery and development, the rehabilitation and development of agriculture demands the highest priority. There is also an urgent need to take fundamental measures to deal with the problems of drought and desertification".

Another passage reads:

"The satisfaction of food requirements for the African people hinges on the rapid reversal of the declining trends of productivity in the rural areas. The alleviation of the problem of growing mass poverty, the capacity to increase foreign exchange earnings and the subsequent dynamization of internal demand forces also depend largely on the rapid improvement of rural incomes and the revitalization of the rural sector."

This is an important document, which shows that there has been a change of heart by all African Governments.

My final quotation from the document reads:

"IFAD's recently established Special Resources for Sub-Saharan Africa should be strongly supported by the international community, and the future financial strength of the institution should be secured."

I heartily welcome, as I know the whole House has, the Minister's announcement that he is reversing the policy announced by his predecessor. We congratulate him on that.

As the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan) said, the dimension of the problem, especially in sub-Saharan Africa, is becoming worse. It is sad that, although international attention is more concentrated on the problem, there seems, according to IFAD, to be fewer resources available in total to deal with the problem. The Food and Agriculture Organisation estimated a short time ago that Africa would have to double its food production in the 1980s to have enough to feed itself. It pointed out that Africa is the only part of the world that now grows less food per head of population than it did in 1960. That is a devastating indictment.

Since 1960, food production in Africa has increased by less than 2 per cent. a year, and the growth rate is now falling. The population, however, has grown by well over 2 per cent. a year, and that rate is rising. From 1960 to 1970, the amount of food available to each person in sub-Saharan Africa increased marginally by about 0·1 per cent. each year. Between 1970 and 1980, it fell annually by 1·2 per cent. a year. That is not the position in any other part of the world, so we need to give special attention to Africa. This is not a matter for IFAD and individual donors alone. The World Bank is playing a major part and it is a welcome sign that it, as well as the IFAD, donor Governments and African Governments, is increasingly regarding agriculture as the crucial sector in development.

The new president of the World Bank, Mr. Barber Conable, in an address to the board of governors in Washington on 30 September, said:

"We will regard agricultural development in the poorest nations as central and critical in the battle against poverty."

In "World Bank News" in May there was a special article on economic development in Africa. The article addressed the population dimension, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Lewisham, East, and focused on the connection between population and the need to increase agriculture production. Part of the article talks of it is obviously a considerable one—and says:

"the threat rapid population growth poses to the natural resource base"—

"Throughout the African continent, natural support systems are under growing strain."

This is not merely, as my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) said from the Opposition Front Bench, because they are threatened by locusts and civil wars.

The paragraph continues:

"In country after country, sustainable yield thresholds of forests and grasslands are being breached. Soil erosion, the loss of soil organic matter, and the depletion of soil nutrients are diminishing land productivity over much of Africa. Although essentially agrarian, African countries are losing the ability to feed themselves. In 1984, approximately 140 million of its 546 million people were fed entirely with grain from abroad."

That proportion is likely to increase between now and the end of the century.

My final quotation from the World Bank report is taken from a memorial lecture given recently in Washington by Mr. Robert McNamara, the former excellent president of the World Bank. He said:

"Altering the economic policy environment in sub-Saharan Africa more in favor of agriculture would dramatically alter the economic scene. It would apportion scarce economic resources more rationally across the economy. It would improve the international competitiveness of the agricultural sector. It would provide incentives to farmers both to produce more, and to produce more efficiently. And it would stimulate more employment, more exports, and more income-earning opportunities."

If anyone understands the problems of Africa and its agriculture, it is Mr. McNamara who spent 12 years as president of the World Bank and a great deal of time visiting African development projects. We must pay great attention to what he says.

I end as I began, congratulating the Minister, welcoming his announcement and hoping that he can persuade his colleagues, especially the Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister, that aid to Africa and its agriculture is vital if we are to avoid further crises in that sad continent. We need more aid and more development, both bilateral and multilateral. The Minister has made a good start. We wish him every success in the battles that he will have in his Government to increase the amount of overseas aid.

1.11 pm

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): I join hon. Members in warmly welcoming my hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Patten) to his new post as Minister for Overseas Development and I do so in no routine and formal way. We know of his excellent record in ministerial office and other capacities and we welcome the strength, deep understanding and compassion that he will bring to debates about some of the poorest people of the world. We welcome the lead that he will give our nation to help those countries to help themselves. He will build on the programme of his predecessor my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Raison), to whom I wish to pay tribute. He fought the battles in the ODA in an unpromising climate within our Government and largely succeeded in reversing a reduction in the ODA budget.

I wish my hon. Friend the Minister good luck in his first battles, which will be on the size of the ODA budget.

I hope that he will be strengthened by our support in convincing the Treasury that we need a larger budget to accommodate the additional resources that he has announced. In spite of advice and pressure not to do so from his Department, his announcement will make money available for IFAD, the special fund for Africa.

IFAD was promoted by the developing countries to find a way of generating money from the oil-rich countries which had huge surpluses in the mid-1970s. It was founded in 1977 with the objective of using those surpluses for the benefit of the poorest people in the world and we should pay those oil-rich countries tribute for that generosity. However, the position has altered dramatically. I welcome the Minister's announcement that serious consideration will be given to how we can carry on with IFAD, given the relative impoverishment of the oil-rich countries which is undermining the basic idea behind the formation of IFAD.

IFAD has established itself in a special role within the United Nation's system of agencies. It has concentrated on the poorest countries and on peasant farming agriculture. Because of the starvation that we have witnessed in the last few years in sub-Saharan Africa, peasant farming is of the greatest importance. Multilateral agencies have been unable to give the kind of attention to it that IFAD has been able to give to it. There was a gap in the system. Quite often it was filled, although sporadically, by bilateral aid. Now IFAD has stepped in to fill that gap. We must find a way to continue that aid and to provide much better finance for peasant farming.

The drop in IFAD's resources from $1,100 million to a pledge of $460 million for the next three-year period is completely inadequate to meet the expanded challenge that IFAD must now confront. The special fund for Africa has tried to redress that shortfall in the context of the 24 poorest countries in Africa, and IFAD's success deserves my hon. Friend's support.

I am worried by my hon. Friend's account of why the ODA is reluctant to respond to special appeals. He said that the UNDP core budget had been reduced because of the special fund that it has launched for Africa. I ask my hon. Friend to examine that statement with care. The British Government have considerably reduced their contributions to the core budget of the United Nations development programme.

The example set by our Government has been followed by other Governments. Thus, the UNDP core budget has been reduced still further. Like IFAD, it is a voluntary fund. That reduction was justifiable in the circumstances connected with the total ODA budget. To argue that, because the core budget has been reduced and the special fund for Africa is in some way connected with it, and therefore is diminishing the core activity of the organisation, is a thorough non sequitur.

The reason for officials advancing that argument to the Minister is the contraction of the bilateral budget of the ODA, compared with its multilateral contributions. That is a direct result of keeping the ODA budget too small.

Of course we must accommodate the multilateral agencies and make contributions to them. In the case of many of those agencies we have to make contributions; contracts and international treaties have been made and we have to provide our proportionate share. That is particularly true of the European Economic Community's budget for overseas development, to which we are obliged to respond in proportion. That is the major cause of the increase in multilateral contributions. In 1979 we contributed 40 per cent. of our total bilateral budget to multilateral institutions. Now our contribution is approaching 60 per cent.

After a budget has been reduced in real terms and then begins to increase in real terms, the bilateral programme is squeezed. Therefore, we must resist any suggestion that we should provide even more money for multilateral aid. My hon. Friend said that it was argued that this represented a distortion of the core funding, that it distorted overall priorities within the programme and that this is a mere rationalisation, resulting from the nature of the problems that confront his Department. I am delighted that my hon. Friend has overruled those arguments and that he has made a contribution of which we can all be proud. I congratulate him on it.

The amount of money that my hon. Friend has contributed is more than just a token, but let me examine the figure. My hon. Friend announced a contribution of 10 million United States dollars, or £7 million, for the special fund. That is half the amount that I understood, after reading the World Development Movement's brief, would be our proportionate share of any special fund.

In addition, my hon. Friend made no reference to the period over which he would expect to contribute that. As I understand it, the social fund is expected to be drawn down over three years and that would mean that the ODA's contribution would be only about £2·3 million per annum. That is not to be sneezed at, but it is a small sum. It may be proportionate to the contribution of the United States and others, but it is a small figure. I urge my hon. Friend to consider whether this is an adequate response to the needs of the special fund. However, I understand, as I have outlined, why he would have difficulty in arguing for a still larger sum. None the less, it is a small figure to deal with the special difficulties with which IFAD is being asked to deal.

Many of the programmes in our bilateral budget are of immense importance. In particular, I welcome the announcement that my hon. Friend is giving additional money to the research being carried out in western Sudan into sub-Saharan African problems of dry farming. There are some significant developments in that area which could transform it. First, it is clear from the research done so far that the wadi bottoms in the desert are capable of being farmed. They retain sub-surface water which could be tapped and could provide the farming necessary to support the much larger populations about which my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan) and the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) are deeply concerned.

Unfortunately, the nutrients in that soil are so limited that it is doubtful whether they will be able to support the necessary crops for any length of time. After one, two or three years the nutrients will be absorbed and will not be renewable, leading to the disastrous type of shifting agriculture that has been the traditional practice in the area over the years.

However, there are developments, to which I hope our money is going, which will provide moisture at the roots of the crops and trees being planted in the area which involve injecting into the soil an absorbent material which retains sufficient moisture for plants to absorb the nutrients in the material and to survive, prosper and provide the food needed. That is the sort of investment in rural development in small areas which our bilateral budget is designed for and is supremely able to give. I am delighted that my hon. Friend has seen fit to contribute in that special way.

I do not want to undermine our bilateral budget because it has worthwhile projects which have become more efficient and better focused over the past seven years or so. We owe a great deal to the ODA and people working in it for the quality of their work. As I have made clear, we should be doing even more.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham and the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) have pointed out that, from the IFAD fund, we gain £2 of procurement for every £1 that we contribute, so there is a self-interested motivation for contributing to the special fund. It probably has not escaped my hon. Friend the Minister's attention that if we had not contributed to the special fund we would not have been able to benefit from the procurement under that fund from which, as I have said, we disproportionately benefit.

I want my hon. Friend the Minister to give serious consideration to a fact that I learnt on a recent visit to Washington with the all-party committee on overseas development. The Japanese Government and the Japanese tenderers tender for every contract put out by the United Nations agencies. One wonders how they can do it. To tender for those contracts is an expensive business which involves research and travel. Indeed, the production of the documents is a costly business. The Japanese Government meet all the costs. The Japanese do not benefit from their contributions on a 2:1 basis as we do; they benefit by 13:1. For every Japanese yen put into the World Bank the Japanese draw out 13.

There is a lesson for us. For many reasons, we should support tenders for UN contracts and put them on a level with the Japanese. That could be a potent source of export orders and therefore a means by which we can reduce unemployment here, particularly in your constituency, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because it would be involved. Such a scheme would be of mutual benefit to us and to the countries overseas.

I hope that the Minister will take that suggestion up with the Minister for Trade to whom I have written on the subject. We must support our tenderers. I hope that in future we receive more that £2 of procurement for every £1 that we invest.

A parallel fund is that operated by the IDA. That fund has recently been agreed at $11·5 billion — a major reduction on the IDA-6 in real terms, but an increase on the IDA-7. This is too small an amount. To keep up in real terms with the increased call on its resources by China and India, the fund should amount to $20 billion.

The finance director of the World Bank, Mr. Moeen Quereshi, recently said that many of the African countries would not have been excluded from further IMF support because they could not pay the short-term high-interest loans without balance of payments support if a more generous contribution had been made to IDA-7. That would have assisted productive enterprise and prevented the need to import food. That food could have been grown at home with the help of grants and assistance from the IDA.

The IFAD special fund and the IDA fund are too small. Per capita food production in Africa is declining. There is also a net flow of capital and interest payments out of Africa to the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund and the developed countries. Can the world justify taking resources out of such countries without trying to put back more money?

I welcome the Minister's support for the special fund but I hope that he will be able to persuade the powers that be in our Government and elsewhere to offer more support. The Minister has already made progress with the food aid programme within the EEC. I hope that larger funds will be produced domestically and internationally so that these serious problems can be addressed.

1.29 pm

Mr. Guy Barnett (Greenwich): I am glad to follow the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) because we were together on the recent visit to Washington by the all-party group on overseas development. I agree with some of his comments about that visit. I congratulate the Minister on his appointment. If I have any regrets, they arise from the remarks by my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) who suggested that there might be some Balliol collusion. I hope that no such collusion will exist across the Dispatch Boxes. I speak as one who attended a different but no less illustrious college at the same university.

I agree with a number of things that the Minister said. I agree with the decision that he announced and I think that it has had an almost universal welcome in the House. What he has announced may not be enough but the principle behind the decision to contribute to the special fund of IFAD was the right one to make. When the Minister's predecessor was asked about this subject, he said:

> "I agree that the development of agriculture is a high priority throughout the Third world. IFAD does a good job, but I remind my hon. Friend that the more we put into multilateral agencies such as this, the less is available for our own bilateral programme".—[Official Report, 2 December 1985; Vol. 88, c.17]

I am afraid it appears that the consequences of the Minister's action are that to that degree there will be less for our own bilateral programme. As the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) said, we need more money. I understand the anxiety in the Department that an ever larger proportion of our aid budget goes to multilateral agencies and that an increasing proportion of that multilateral budget goes to the disgustingly inefficient European development fund and the programmes that it runs. That is sad, because, like the previous Minister, the right hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Raison), I agree that our bilateral programme is on the whole well run, especially in agriculture, about which I shall say something later. But there is a problem and it will eat further into the bilateral programme that Britain is able to mount in the developing world.

I have no doubts about the value of our contribution and I echo many of the congratulatory remarks that have been made about IFAD and its relevance to the problems of agriculture in the Third world, especially the relevance of the special programme that it recently mounted for Africa. Some hon. Members spoke about water conservation and the importance of forestry. I should mention also the emphasis placed on the importance of seeds, implements and fertilisers and the emphasis that is given to traditional crops such as cassava, sorghum and millet in the more vulnerable areas of the African continent.

The fund quite properly emphasises the importance of production in small units by smallholder farmers. For some years there has been an argument about overseas development and about what is and is not real aid. I have become more and more impatient with this argument. It is as though there was special merit in providing for food production as opposed to crop production for export or in placing emphasis on agriculture rather than on infrastructure developments of one kind or another. In many respects these are false arguments because crop production and the production of food by the farmer and his family are of equal and complementary importance to his standard of living. The road that carries the crops out and is used to carry supplies to rural areas is also important. I approve of the road that Britain provided in the Embu and Maru areas of Kenya. That is an example of a road that opens up an area in which there can be increased production of crops for export, which helps Kenya's balance of payments.

The emphasis on smallholder farming is important where it produces both crops and food for the family. In certain more favourable climes it can often produce a variety of crops so that the very diversity that an individual smallholder produces can, to some extent, shield him against fluctuating commodity prices. That is a powerful case.

Mr. Bowen Wells: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one of the most outstanding examples of that is in Kenya, a country that he knows well, where the smallholder tea and coffee plantations also produce cash crops for the markets, and therefore provide food not only for the family but for the wider population in those areas? Those co-operatives were started by the Commonwealth Development Corporation, which comes within my hon. Friend the Minister's Department but which my hon. Friend may not yet have had an opportunity to see.

Mr. Barnett: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention because I, too, wish strongly to recommend to the Minister that he takes an early opportunity to see the tea and coffee production that was originated by the CDC in Kenya. It is now the responsibility of the Tea Development Authority in Kenya. If the Minister has the opportunity to visit that country, I hope that he will also see the Mumias sugar operation that I saw earlier this year. I did not actually visit the factories, but I saw, at a distance, the enormous change that it has made to the whole terrain. I discovered that farm incomes and the general level of prosperity in western Kenya had been considerably enhanced by that development, which can only be good.

It is important to emphasise that so far I have been talking about the relatively well endowed parts of Africa —areas fortunate enough to receive two crops a year because the rainfall pattern makes that possible and where there is a high level of fertility in the soil so that farmers can reap modestly good incomes even with the sort of difficulties mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall arising from the desperate position in which their Governments find themselves with the fluctuating and often falling commodity prices, although Kenya is relatively fortunate in the way in which tea and coffee prices have moved. Nevertheless, it is possible for many farmers to provide for themselves and also to receive a cash income, which makes their position fairly reasonable.

One of the strong points that came out of the report of the all-party parliamentary group on overseas development published just over a year ago was, alas, that, contrary to what the Minister said, Britain does not seem to figure very well in the more vulnerable areas of Africa. When the Minister's predecessor spoke, quite properly, about the value of the British contribution to agriculture in Africa, he sometimes failed to recognise the degree to which the more vulnerable areas were sometimes neglected. If the Minister has not yet had the opportunity to glance at the report, he may be interested in what it says on pages 20 and 21 which refer to the distribution of British aid. At the bottom of page 20 the report states:

> "Rural development expenditures have remained a very low proportion of total spending. In fact, the figure for allocation — rather than expenditures — shows an even sharper decline from £3·7 million in 1979 and £10 million in 1980 to under £0·2 million in 1984."

Those are the areas about which we need to be concerned. We need to find more money for the more difficult matter of rural development in the vulnerable areas. That is more difficult and it takes longer—it may take five, 10 or 15 years before one is able to restore the position in areas that were vulnerable in the recent famine.

In that connection, I hope that the Minister will look carefully during his first few months in office at what has happened to the old scientific units such as the Tropical Development and Research Institute. That aspect of the Department's activities has been severely cut both in staff and in ability to provide the scientific advice that is badly needed by countries affected by drought, locusts and poor conservation of soil. We have a special contribution to make in that sector, whether through organisations such as IFAD or through bilateral programmes.

We have an enormously important contribution to make. Yesterday I met representatives of the British Consultants Bureau, which has a variety of professional advice available to the Department and international agencies and is unrivalled in the expertise that it can offer. Many hon. Members will be aware of the significant contribution that the water industry is making, in particular through Water Aid, which is practically and voluntarily supported by the staffs of Thames and other water authorities. Those are important contributions and they can be of a special order because of our experience and our tradition as a former colonial power. For instance, the number of people who worked as agricultural officers and the number of institutes in our universities and research institutes are the inheritance of the institutions set up to back up the work done by the Colonial Office in earlier days.

Mr. Cash: I had the great opportunity of going to Canada with the CPA delegation in July, and heard that that country is thinking about ways of exporting its water. Has the hon. Gentleman heard of this, and does he regard Commonwealth co-operation on such a scale and in such a way as realistic?

Mr. Barnett: There are some occasions when I feel that we would be well advised to export some of our water. However, I suspect that this would be an expensive operation and I prefer the suggestings made by the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford about water conservation. My hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall spoke about other forms of water conservation for use during dry periods. We must recognise the fact that in the African continent the rains may fail. A survey that I did many years ago showed that in one area—a particularly well endowed area not far from Lake Victoria — the rains failed on average this century once every three years.

Such experiences are written into many traditional methods that African farmers use, from which we should be learning. Sometimes we are all too apt to go out to Africa and tell the world how to live—I have made this point before — forgetting that many of the traditional methods of African agriculture are born of such experience. Often, we can reinforce what that experience teaches because it is based on the practical experience of African farmers.

I underline my support for IFAD, and for the step that the Minister has taken, which is absolutely right. I hope that it is the forerunner of more pressure by the Minister on his fellow Ministers and, indeed, on the Cabinet. Most hon. Members will be behind him. He will know that a growing and articulate body of public opinion supports him. He has already said that overseas development will be an issue in the next general election. I hope that, both within and outside the House, he will give the subject a higher profile than it has enjoyed in the past.

1.45 pm

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): I congratulate the Minister on his appointment and wish him well. I also congratulate him on his announcement this morning of additional support for the International Fund for Agricultural Development's special fund. Our problem is that, in the decade up to 1983, United Kingdom aid to sub-Saharan Africa decreased in real terms. Let us hope that his announcement this morning will reverse that trend, because during that decade, Japan, the United States, Canada and even the OPEC countries increased their contributions. However, from what we heard this morning, OPEC is no longer in a position to increase its contribution.

The hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan) mentioned the gap between a 2·5 per cent. increase in food production and a 3 per cent. increase in population in many of the countries which we are discussing. That is one of the most serious statistics with which we must wrestle. Food production cannot catch up with population growth unless we have a crash programme to help the African countries especially to help themselves.

References have been made to the problem of locusts in the Horn of Africa. That is a serious problem that must be tackled immediately. We cannot wait a minute longer. Another unfortunate problem is the war in the Sudan, which is causing tremendous disruption and hardship and increased poverty and starvation among the people of that country. The staff of the college at which I used to lecture — the Welsh agricultural college — are engaged in a programme in the Sudan to try to assist the people there. They are training the trainers so that the people of the Sudan can learn how to help themselves in developing their agriculture, but they have a difficult task because of the present conditions in that country. The low technology development of the innate farming practices in African countries must be encouraged. In that respect, I agree wholeheartedly with the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett).

The statistics on starvation in the African continent are alarming. In the few years up to 1985, 1 million Ethiopian people died from starvation each year. In the wider context of the Third world, 12 million children under the age of five died in 1978, and recent statistics suggest that the present figure may be 15 million. The World Bank has estimated that 800 million people are starving. No one in any Western country can be proud of those figures. We must tackle the problem urgently and with a great deal of spirit and direction.

The most telling statistic that I have heard is that it costs $400 to transport 1 tonne of grain or wheat to Africa, but that an African can grow 1 tonne of wheat a year for the next 20 years at a cost of just $200. That is an astonishing state of affairs. We must help those countries to help themselves. The Minister's announcement today is a move in the right direction.

We have not met the United Nations target contribution of 0·7 per cent. of GDP in aid for Third world countries. We have been stuck at about 0·35 or 0·36 per cent. of GDP. Knowing the Minister's record, I am sure that he will do something to put that right.

The development of local agriculture is the key. The IFAD has a major role in developing African and Third world agriculture and we must back it. I believe that, with our encouragement, the Minister will show the way.

Mr. Geraint Howells (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): I endorse the sentiments of hon. Members who wish the Minister well in his new job. He has a challenging task and I am sure that he will enjoy his job and will help those who are less fortunate than we are.

Earlier this year I joined hon. Members from both sides of the House on a visit to Somalia. I plead on behalf of the people of Somalia. I have heard hon. Members arguing that solutions must be found to long-term problems such as the development of local agriculture, but I believe that the biggest problems are the short-term problems.

The parliamentary delegation visited the camps in Somalia where millions of people live in hope that their next meal will come from somewhere. I saw women queueing all day for a week's rations. It was a depressing sight. On the other hand, we in the Western world produce so much food, but we leave the surplus in intervention stores for years and then dispose of it at a giveaway price or dump it in the sea. There is something radically wrong with our marketing and distribution system in Europe.

We were invited to see what we were told was a brand new school in northern Somalia. We discovered that the building consisted merely of branches that had been pushed into the ground. A few camels had been slaughtered and skinned to provide some cover from the sun. The children had nothing to write on, they could only listen to the teacher. Partitions between the classes were also made of branches. I thought to myself how fortunate we are in the West where we live in prosperous nations.

The President and other members of the Somalian Government told us that they were not interested in loans, because they would never be able to repay them. They were interested in grants and aid from other countries and organisations. We are all morally bound, no matter which party we support, to try to persuade people in power to help such countries.

The countries of the world spend enough on arms in a fortnight—$17·5 billion—to feed, house, educate and look after the health of every individual in Africa for a year.

Some of us believe ourselves to be Christians, and are thus morally bound to try to help those who are less fortunate than we. On their behalf, I urge the Minister to give them more aid. Perhaps he could ask the Agriculture Minister to try and persuade his European counterparts to do something with the surplus food. I know that it would be difficult to persuade them, that it could be sent to other countries, and to Somalia in particular. That country has good roads to the camps and an excellent port which could accept the food.

I hope that my little plea will be heard by someone somewhere, so that those unfortunate people can be better cared for and to live in a better society in the future.

Mr. Chris Patten: Perhaps it is appropriate that we should be debating this order on United Nations day. Indeed, it may or may not be appropriate that the debate should have been launched by two hon. Members from the same stable—which was not Trinity. However, if the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett) was in the Chamber, I would not want him to think that there was a conspiracy. Indeed, I mean no disrespect to the hon. Members for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) and for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) when I say that if the Liberal party's spokesman on these matters had been in the Chamber, the hon. Member for Greenwich might well have thought that a conspiracy was afoot, as he is also entitled to wear the same halter as I have on today.

I enjoyed the speech of the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland). Last time I heard him speak it was in the Oxford union with, I believe, Richard Crossman. I agree with some of what he said, and about the importance of examining with some urgency the basis of IFAD's future financing. Indeed, I mentioned that at the beginning of the debate. I hope that we shall be able to make substantial progress after December. The hon. Gentleman suggested that the trend of IFAD's activities was insufficient. But if the new replenishment and special programme are committed, as planned, until the end of 1988, IFAD will be providing $300 million or more each year. That is well above the level for every year since 1982. In a sense, no amount can be enough, but IFAD is not the only player on the field.

Mr. Stuart Holland: From the Minister's earlier remarks, I assume that the £7 million involved is spread over a three-year period, and so amounts to about £2·3 million a year. However, the minimum necessary is at least double that amount. The target figure should be at least £5 million a year. I hope that he and his colleagues will work on that point so that IFAD's funding is more in line with real needs.

I also hope that the Minister will deal with the locust problem. It is a matter not simply of whether light aircraft can get into Tigré but of getting backpacks in to spray crops, and so on. The Eritrean Relief Association has made a submission to the Minister, and if he has not received it, we can let him have it. I hope that he will be able to respond to it.

Mr. Patten: I certainly want to consider the contribution that we are making to the special fund, its amount and its proportion in relation to what other countries are doing, and the important question of locusts which the hon. Gentleman mentioned in his speech, but perhaps I could do that in sequence of argument so that my remarks may be easier to follow than they otherwise would be. The hon. Gentleman spoke extremely eloquently about the problems of Africa. However, I did not agree with everything that he said, as I shall make clear later and as I hope to have opportunities of making clear during many similar debates over the next several years.

I remind the House of what we are doing for Africa. We have made and continue to make a substantial contribution to development in that continent. We have provided over £2,000 million of aid through bilateral and multilateral channels to Africa since 1982. A total of £570 million was provided in 1985 alone, when 43 per cent. of all British aid went directly or indirectly to Africa. In terms of bilateral aid, Sudan received over £42 million last year; Kenya, £34 million; Zambia, £26 million; Zimbabwe, £24 million, and the list continues.

We shall continue to provide effective assistance to those African countries which have demonstrated their need for it and their ability to use it to good purpose. Two recent examples underline that commitment. We have offered £25 million in fast spending aid for Tanzania to support economic reforms agreed with the International Monetary Fund. I recognise the courage and the difficulty which some of those reforms will involve. I have just announced £6 million of grant aid for the Gambia in support of its economic recovery programme, which is backed by the fund and the World Bank. Britain has also been ahead of many other donors in converting past aid loans to the poorest countries into grants. I think that we are well up at the top of the field with the Germans. That policy has been worth £1 billion to those countries. Africa alone has benefited to the tune of £260 million.

It is important for OECD countries and those in the developed world to give African and other developing countries the help they need, especially when they adopt policies which are more likely to lay down solid foundations for sustainable development in future. That is especially relevant to agriculture on which we rightly contribute much of our effort.

I listened to what the hon. Member for Vauxhall said. I thought that there was a disjuncture between his remarks and some of the speeches that I read made during the United Nations special session. For example, I thought that there was a disjuncture between what the Senegalese Foreign Minister said at the end of the session and the action programme drawn up largely by the African countries. An increasing number of African Governments are a great deal more realistic about economic policy than the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Stuart Holland: When the hon. Gentleman has spent more time at the Dispatch Box—he is new to the portfolio—he will realise that Senegal is not among the least developed African countries. It is the main beneficiary from the Lomé programme. Senegal does well out of virtually every programme that goes south of the Mediterranean. A speech by a Senegalese Minister is not exactly definitive proof that we are remedying the problems of sub-Saharan Africa.

Mr. Patten: I can help the hon. Gentleman by sending him, in addition, a speech made by President Kaunda, that I read the other day. I am not sure whether he would apply the same arguments to President Kaunda, in his position. I should be perfectly happy to go through with him what the Tanzanians have just agreed to do, I think sensibly, and what the Gambians have agreed to do.

The hon. Member for Vauxhall mentioned some names with which I am still too much of a tyro to be acquainted. He referred at some length to what he regards as the World Bank's market-oriented solutions, which he considers not to be relevant to African countries. That argument is refuted by the clear economic revival in Ghana and the great increase in agricultural productivity in Zambia. Both Ghana and Zambia have taken difficult policy decisions, which are decidely market oriented, on World Bank advice.

Mr. Stuart Holland: The reality is, as the Minister will learn if he talks to President Kaunda, that both he and the Tanzanians who talked to me about this matter were made an offer that they were not in a position to refuse. It was a "godfather" offer from the International Monetary Fund that was backed by the British Government. In other words, his predecessor would support a bilateral programme only if Tanzania would agree to IMF conditionality. That was deeply resented by the Tanzanians. Ghana has a debt of $2 billion and it takes 67 per cent. of its export earnings to finance the repayments on that debt. It is a crippling debt. Only two days ago I was talking to those in the Ghanian presidency about this matter and they said that they would like the Minister to do something about it.

Mr. Patten: I am not able yet, though I look forward to being in the position, to drop names in the hon. Gentleman's style, who in time will be a formidable competitor for the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr Healey). He still has some way to go along the road. The hon. Gentleman's experience and his remarks about Africa are not borne out by what has happened or by what has been happening in a number of African countries. I look forward to returning to the Chamber with a great deal more anecdotal experience. I look forward also to trying — I am sure successfully — to move on the hon. Gentleman from the formidable intellectual position which he now occupies. He seems to be stuck in a rather early stage of Tanzanian socialism, which has gone out of fashion everywhere except the National Executive Committee of the Labour party.

The hon. Member for Vauxhall referred in passing to European food surpluses and the situation in Africa. He will know how much importance I attach to that. With respect to the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells), I do not think that my analysis and his would necessarily tally, but I confess in saying that that I do not represent an agricultural constituency. It is vital for us to reform the European Communities food aid regulations. It took nearly five years for us to get the present entirely inadequate regulations in place and we shall be trying in a matter of months to reform the regulations.

I hope that we shall have the support of organisations such as the World Development Movement, which I understand has organised a petition on the subject throughout Europe. I hope that we shall be able to make significant progress at the next development council meeting in November. Even if we cannot bring off a new food aid regulation from that council, I hope that we shall be able at least to make sufficient progress to see a new regulation introduced as soon thereafter as possible. That is vital because I think that public opinion is increasingly outraged by the cruel paradox of substantial surpluses in Europe and famine and deficit in Africa and elsewhere.

The hon. Member for Vauxhall referred to locusts. We have provided a total of £2·5 million this year for locust and pest control in Africa, over £800,000 of which was recently announced as being available for urgently needed insecticides, spraying equipment and transport in Botswana, the Gambia, Mali, Senegal, the Sahel and Niger. Of the remainder, nearly £1 million has been provided for various forms of pest control in Ethiopia, especially in connection with the drive against armyworm.

I listened with interest and sympathy to what the hon. Gentleman said about Ethiopia. As he will be aware, there are certain difficulties in dealing with sovereign Governments. I do not mean this as pejoratively as it will sound, but an approach which has at least something in common with gunboat diplomacy, however admirable and humanitarian its objectives, is difficult to carry through. However, there is a substantial problem, of which I am aware, with the villagisation and resettlement programme in Ethiopia. We are considering how best we can deal with that now both on our own and through multinational organsiations. I am hoping to send a senior official from the ODA to Ethiopia shortly to see what more we can do in terms of rehabilitation and generally.

At the meeting of the joint assembly of the European Parliament and ACP countries I was able to talk—I am name-dropping again—to the Ethiopian ambassador to the European Community and to an Ethiopian Minister whom I learnt to call Comrade Mersie. I put these points forcibly to them and, as I have said, we are hoping to send a senior official to Ethiopia shortly. I shall ensure that I see the document about the situation in Tigré and Eritrea, to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

I was particularly grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East for welcoming me to the Dispatch Box in this guise. My hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins), whom I know cannot be present for my reply and who had the courtesy to explain that he had a constituency engagement, both referred to population policy and its importance to our multilateral and bilateral aid programme. Population policy will be on the agenda of the development council meeting on 11 November. The Commission has put forward a paper on the subject and I hope that we shall have an interesting and useful discussion. There are considerable sensitivities on the issue. Some of them are even greater in donor countries than in recipent countries, if I may make that slightly provocative point. We should attempt to reach a commonly agreed position in the EC next month.

My hon. Friend also referred to women in development — a subject which I was able to discuss with the president of the World Bank on Monday. He made some interesting remarks in his speech to the governors of the World Bank at the end of September, to which the hon. Member for Walthamstow also referred. My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) suggested that I should make as many early visits as possible to some international financial institutions and I hope to begin with a visit to the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund at the beginning of the new year.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford, whose speech reminded me what a tiro I am in these matters, dealt particularly with the relationship between core funds and special programmes. He took me to task ever so nicely, as he is perfectly entitled to do, about what I said. I gathered from his remarks that he thought that what I said had been planted in my mouth by a Department which I have already learnt to respect and enjoy. I am grown up enough to be responsible for anything I do or say these days.

Quite apart from the arguments about the relationship between bilateral and multilateral aid, I am disinclined to accept fragmentation. One consequence of the multiplication of special programmes is that one avoids dealing with basic problems — for example, IFAD's replenishment. Special programmes mean more bureaucracy for the administration of small amounts of money. Special funds are administratively more costly than core operations.

My hon. Friend asked me about the amount of money that we are making available for the special programme. He was right to refer to the time scale. The money will be drawn down over three to four years. I must again emphasise that, proportionately, we shall be contributing more than a number of other countries will be contributing. If OPEC had contributed to the special fund, and had it reached $300 million, our contribution to the programme would have been less. If the programme fetches up without OPEC at substantially less than that amount, our contribution will be above our normal share.

In my judgment, it would be wholly wrong for our contribution to the special programme to exceed our contribution to the replenishment. I understand the importance of obtaining a good share of the procurement which follows on from the work of the fund. I shall take up my hon. Friend's remarks, following his visit to Washington earlier this autumn.

The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) referred to a number of matters concerning Sudan. I was able to discuss these matters about 10 days ago during the extremely valuable visit to this country of the Prime Minister of Sudan. The hon. Member also referred to the position of children in developing countries. He may know that recently I have announced an additional grant of £1 million in response to a UNICEF appeal for assistance to children in certain African countries, particularly for immunisation. That is over and above our normal grant, which is about £6·5 million.

The hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett) sugested that our contribution to the special programme would mean that we should have less money to spend elsewhere. I am pleased to say that we are making this contribution from a budget that is now growing in real terms. It will come out of our unallocated reserve. I realise that these terms of art are even more familiar to certain hon. Members than they are to me. Whole books, not to speak of House of Commons Select Committee reports, have been written on such subjects. Nevertheless, I am pleased to be able to say that our contribution to the special programme will not displace any other bilateral programme that may be proposed.

The hon. Member for Greenwich also referred to the Commonwealth Development Corporation. I am looking forward to seeing some of its work. My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford also referred to the CDC. Its contribution to developing countries has been impressive. I note also what the hon. Member for Greenwich said about the important role played in the work of the ODA by its scientific units, in particular the Tropical Development and Research Institute. I have heard much about the excellence of its work, particularly in agricultural research. I am looking forward to visiting it soon to see its activities for myself.

Finally, the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) reminded us, with his admirable and characteristic Welsh eloquence, of the objective of our aid programme. I hope that, with other hon. Members, I shall be able to play a small part in helping to achieve that objective and, as a step along the way, I should like to commend again this order to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft International Fund for Agricultural Development (Second Replenishment) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 30th June, be approved.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Tuesday 28th October, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business), if proceedings on the Motion in the name of Sir William van Straubenzee relating to the Deacons (Ordination of Women) Measure have not been previously disposed of, Mr. Speaker shall at Seven o'clock put the Question thereon.—[Mr. Maude.]

Structure Plan (Dorset)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Maude.]

2.19 pm

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): I am grateful to have this opportunity to address the House and particularly grateful to so many of my hon. Friends for coming in to listen to this important debate on the future of south-east Dorset. I understand that we may be interrupted by other business in about 10 minutes.

I begin by thanking my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for being present to listen to a matter which is of overriding concern to my constituents. It is customary to try to link one debate with the previous debate. My hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development did not mention the excellent work which is being done in the Sudan by British railway locomotive engineers in restoring to working order some of the steam engines there. That gives me the opportunity to apologise —while my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker) is on his way to the Chamber, in case my hon. Friend the Minister is wondering why I am discussing this —for the fact that I had to forgo the pleasure today of being in Barry in south Wales to name a 9F locomotive in order to be here to do what I consider to be even more important than that.

I make no apology for raising again an issue which I was able to raise on the Adjournment on 12 June 1985. The future of south-east Dorset's environment is fundamental to my constituents. Since that debate, Dorset county council has produced a first review of the south-east Dorset structure plan. I have to tell my hon. Friend—I hope that it is not his fault — that there is growing disillusion among the people of south-east Dorset about whether their views count for anything in the consultation that takes place from time to time about the future of the environment in which they live.

The chairman of the county council's planning and transportation committee, in her introduction to the document, says:

"Before making any decisions, they"— that is, the county council—

"will consider fully all views which are expressed to them by those concerned for the future of South East Dorset."

The council may well "consider", but what my constituents want is not consideration of their views but acknowledgment of their views and action in accordance with what they believe they are entitled to expect from the Government and their county council.

My hon. Friend the Minister knows that we are awaiting the result of one of the most controversial and contentious planning applications that has ever been seen in Dorset put forward by the Carroll group. It is contrary to the present structure plan and to the Government's declared green belt policies. It is opposed by all the local authorities — Christchurch, Wimborne and New Forest —as well as by the Dorset county council, and it has outraged local opinion. A great deal of store will be set in Dorset by the Government's final decision on that application.

But the latest threat comes not from an application from a developer but from proposals put forward by the county council itself in the first review of the south-east Dorset structure plan. In the past few weeks my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North and I have been innundated with concern about and objections to the county council's proposals. There is almost numbed shock in our part of Dorset and almost universal opposition to what the county council proposes.

The only friends which the structure plan proposals seem to have are a handful of the county council's officers, a handful of Dorset county councillors and one or two district councillors. But the elected councillors who support the proposals are very shy indeed. I would not mind if elected councillors had the courage to stand up and support what they think should be done, but that, I regret, is not the luxurious position in which we find ourselves.

The fact is that the plan as put forward by the county council is being blamed on the Government. The purpose of this debate today is to probe just how much truth there is in assertions by county council officials that they have put forward a plan that they know to be disliked and unpopular, not because they want it and not because the people want it but because they believe that it is essential in accordance with Government policies emanating from the Department of the Environment.

We in Dorset spent 18 months in long earnest discussion about the structure plan which was finally approved by the Secretary of State for the Environment in 1980. It was a compromise plan but it was accepted locally and by the Department. That plan has been overtaken by events outwith the control of the local authorities most affected.

There are two main causes for the rape of the 1980 structure plan. First, appeals by developers against planning refusals, particularly by Wimborne and Christchurch councils, have overwhelmed the housebuilding levels set down in that plan. We are told constantly by the district councils, particularly Wimborne and Christchurch, that they have lost control over their own environment.

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): They have all lost control.

Mr. Adley: We should all take note of the problem. It is serious if local government cannot control its own planning environment.

Secondly, the policy for housing starts in Dorset has been statistically ravaged by Bournemouth's deliberate policy to build, build, build, regardless of the structure plan.

I have statistics relating to the five district councils in south-east Dorset. The five areas are Bournemouth, Christchurch, Poole, Purbeck and Wimborne. The structure plan proposals for housing starts in 1976-86 were 3,600, 3,200, 8,400, 1,200 and 4,600 respectively. The actual completions in Bournemouth, instead of 3,600, were 8,492; for Christchurch, instead of 3,200 they were 3,637; for Poole, instead of 8,400 they were 10,350; for Purbeck, instead of 1,200 they were 1,326; and for Wimborne, instead of 4,600 they were 7,083. The percentage overbuild in those years was 135 per cent. in Bournemouth, 14 per cent. in Christchurch, 23 per cent. in Poole, 11 per cent. in Purbeck and 54 per cent. in Wimborne.

The difference is that Bournemouth has been deliberate whereas the results in other areas are mainly caused by overturning planning refusals.

I shall not weary the House with statistics for the rest of Dorset, but planning overruns on this scale should be of concern to us all. The plan is as much the Minister's, since it was approved by his Department, as it is the local authorities'.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker), in his eloquent and straightforward manner, has described the proposals in the structure plan review as "an environmental disaster." I echo his words.

Dorset county council claims that it is operating at the behest of the Department of the Environment and in accordance with Government policy requirements. That is why the proposal in the 1980 plan for 35,000 new dwellings has become 62,000 new dwellings.

We need to probe the Government's attitude towards the creation of structure plans by county councils. For that reason I have given my hon. Friend the Minister a list of 10 questions which I propose to ask him this afternoon. It is now 2.29 pm, so before I start to read them out I shall continue to preamble until 2.30 and start again after the Foreign Secretary's statement.

There is irrefutable evidence that Dorset county council is blaming the Government for having to produce thoroughly unpopular and unacceptable proposals. I have given notice of the 10 questions to my hon. Friend the Minister. If they are fully answered they should satisfy those people in my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North about where the blame lies for the production of these wholly unwanted and extraordinarily unpopular plans.

It being half-past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Anglo-Syrian Relations

2.30 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement on Anglo-Syrian relations.

The House will be aware that the trial of Nezar Hindawi at the Central Criminal Court ended today. Hindawi was found guilty of attempting to place a bomb on an El Al aircraft at Heathrow on 17 April and was sentenced to 45 years' imprisonment. Hindawi has been convicted of a monstrous and inhumane crime. If he had been successful, hundreds of innocent lives would have been lost. The way in which he deceived his pregnant girl friend into carrying the bomb was particularly wicked and has aroused deep and universal repugnance.

There is conclusive evidence of Syrian official involvement with Hindawi. The House will recall that in May after Hindawi's arrest the Government demanded the withdrawal of three Syrian embassy attachés whose diplomatic immunity the Syrian Government declined to waive so that the police could question them. Evidence at the trial revealed something of the part these attachés played in this affair. The Syrians claim that they dealt with Hindawi throughout as a bona fide journalist. That claim is frankly incredible.

Evidence was produced at the trial that Hindawi spent some time in hotel accommodation reserved for Syrian Arab Airlines crew, and that Hindawi spent the night after the bombing attempt in Syrian embassy accommodation, where his hair clippings and hair dye were found. Certain facts are undisputed. Hindawi travelled on an official Syrian passport in a false name; his visa applications were on two occasions backed by official notes from the Syrian Foreign Ministry; and he met the Syrian ambassador, Dr. Haydar, in his embassy after the discovery of the bomb.

In addition, we have independent evidence that the Syrian ambassador was personally involved several months before the commission of the offence in securing for Hindawi the sponsorship of the Syrian intelligence authorities. We have equally compelling evidence that during his detention Hindawi sought to contact secretly Syrian intelligence officials in Damascus with a request for their assistance in securing his release.

The whole House will be outraged by the Syrian role in this case. It is unacceptable that the ambassador, members of his staff, and the Syrian authorities in Damascus should be involved with a criminal like Hindawi. We have therefore decided to break diplomatic relations with Syria.

Dr. Haydar was informed of this decision this morning and was told to close his embassy and leave the country within 14 days. The British embassy in Damascus will also be closed. We shall seek to make alternative arrangements of the usual kind for the protection of British interests in Syria. We are also tightening the security arrangements surrounding the operations in London of Syrian Arab Airlines by imposing special controls on all Syrian Arab Airlines aircraft and crew, including stricter searches of personnel, passengers and baggage. The House will recall that last June we introduced a tougher and stricter visa regime for Syrians wishing to enter the United Kingdom. We shall maintain and strengthen this regime.

We are taking urgent steps to inform our European partners and other friendly Governments about the details of the case and the measures that we are taking. We are impressing on them the wider security implications of the involvement of the Syrian authorities and are urging them to take appropriate supporting action. We regret that these actions have been forced on us by the unacceptable behaviour of the Syrian authorities. We remain determined to play our full part with moderate Arab states in the search for peaceful settlement of the region's problems, but we remain second to none in our determination to continue the fight to stamp out terrorism in our midst.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): The Opposition enthusiastically applaud the sentence of the court upon this evil man, and share the Government's sense of outrage at the role of Syrian officials. If the Foreign Secretary is convinced that the Syrian ambassador was knowingly involved, it is clearly unacceptable that either he or any of his staff involved should remain in this country. The Foreign Secretary will know that in the past the Opposition have always endorsed the strongest action against international terrorism and all efforts to co-ordinate effective international action against it.

Is the Foreign Secretary aware of evidence that Mr. Hindawi, together with his brother, was also involved with the Abu Nidal movement from Syrian bases in the Berlin discotheque bombing? If, as a result of new evidence, that is the case, does it not at least throw some doubt on the justification for the bombing of Libya in response to that outrage?

Is the Foreign Secretary convinced by the evidence that the Syrian Government, at the highest level, were involved in the Hindawi incident?

On the question of our allies, as the Foreign Secretary referred to independent evidence against the ambassador predating this offence, to what extent have our allies already been alerted about the evidence available to us and our likely action in response — quite irrespective of today's jury verdict and the sentence?

In the light of the Tokyo agreement and the EEC declaration on combating terrorism, can we assume that both our EEC partners and our American allies will be fully behind us in preparing a similar and co-ordinated response? As the Soviets have made frequent declarations of their own opposition to international terrorism, should not we at least try to put them to the test with the evidence that is available to us?

It is clear that our own national response will be very much weakened if we do not have the support of our allies, including the USA, in response to this outrage. We believe that a clear message should come from a united House that terrorism, from whatever source, will be met with a speedy, robust and exemplary response.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I begin by thanking the hon. Gentleman for the way in which he has approached the matter and for his plain and outspoken endorsement of the approach adopted by Her Majesty's Government to this serious and difficult matter.

On the Berlin bombing, there is no evidence implicating Syria or any country other than Libya in the bombing of the La Belle discotheque last April. That remains the position.

On the question of the implication of the Syrian Government, I have spelt out the series of matters that show the plain involvement of the Syrian intelligence agency and the Syrian ambassador. Quite frankly, it is absurd and untenable to argue that a Government are not responsible and accountable for the actions of their intelligence services and ambassador. That is the basis on which we have formed our conclusions.

The evidence involved in the case is either, as I have described, evidence given in court, evidence about which there was no dispute in court or evidence in respect of which the Government are in a unique position to make their own judgment on the reliability of the information and about which we are completely satisfied.

There has been a limit to the extent to which we have been able to take action to alert in advance our Community and other allied partners because of the inhibitions properly imposed by the dangers of contempt of court. The hon. Gentleman is right to emphasise the importance of a concerted common response to governmental misconduct of this kind. That is why we have taken such care to promote commitments in Europe, and at the Tokyo summit, to such concerted action.

It must be said, as I said in a speech in Bournemouth the other day, that we have not yet reached the point where a country in the front line in such a situation can look to the scale of unity in response from other countries that we would wish. Certainly, we are doing everything that we can to promote the united action for which the hon. Gentleman has pressed. I shall take into account his suggestion that the Soviet Union should similarly be invited to participate in this case.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the whole House will want to endorse his comments on the sentence passed by the court and that the whole country, in the light of the unassailable evidence available to it and all our allies, will want to welcome the prompt and firm action that the Government have taken?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's observation.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Has it not been apparent since before this vile plot was mercifully foiled that a bloodstained trail has been left by Syrian-sponsored agents in Europe and all over the middle east, and that now that trail has been proved to lead back to the doors of the Syrian embassy? Has not the world preferred to turn a blind eye to Syria and concentrate instead on the activities of Libya? The Foreign Secretary's decision is right and justified, but what else is he considering? If we are to stamp out terrorism, we have to make sacrifices, and must we not look further at actions such as the cessation of Syrian Arab Airlines' flights into this country? Will the Foreign Secretary pursue vigourously the point put by the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) about reminding the Soviet Union of its responsibility to use what influence it has over one of its allies and clients?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for underlining, in his last observation, the point made by the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson). As to the general involvement of Syria, it is not prudent for me to make any broad observations. Suffice it to say that the evidence in this case is clear-cut and beyond doubt. We have had to evaluate that evidence in deciding what action to take against the Syrian Government and in relation to Syrian Arab Airlines. There is clear evidence of the involvement of the airline. accommodation and perhaps of the crew to the extent that I have specified, but there is no evidence to support the allegation made by Hindawi that Syrian Arab Airlines is involved in bringing in firearms, explosives and drugs to the United Kingdom. Therefore, we judged that the evidence in this case does not justify stopping its services. We are taking the firmest possible action to step up the surveillance and control of aircraft, crew and passengers.

[Sir Geoffrey Howe]

Mr. Peter Thomas (Hendon, South): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that his prompt statement will receive widespread approval in the country and will be a considerable relief to those of us who have for some time been concerned about the activities of Damascus and its missions overseas in international terrorism? Will he take this opportunity to look again at the activities of PLO representatives in London and ask himself whether something needs to be done about them?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for his endorsement of the action that I have taken. As he says, if we mean what we have said on so many occasions about our commitment to fighting terrorism, we cannot shirk, and must be ready to take, such tough decisions, and we must be ready to take them when the evidence justifies such a conclusion. I shall bear in mind his observations about the PLO, but in each case one is concerned with the evidential quality on which one makes a conclusion.

Mr. Ian Mikardo (Bow and Poplar): I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for his positive response to the suggestion of my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) that he pass to the Government of the Soviet Union the information which he is passing to other Governments. Is it not a fact that the Government of the Soviet Union have more influence with the Syrian Government than any other Government have? Is it not also a fact that there are some signs that, in the past year or two, the Soviets have become a bit disillusioned with Syria as an ally, and is there not a possibility, therefore, that the Soviet Union may turn out to be very helpful in this matter?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: One must proceed with some caution in this area, although it is certainly true that the Soviet Union has been expressing a more significant interest in the need for international co-operation in the fight against terrorism than has been the case in the past. It is also a fact that there has been and still is a relationship between the Soviet Union and Syria which justifies, in general terms, the point made by the hon. Gentleman. But I cannot say how practically effective that link may turn out to be.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that not only the whole House—as is obvious already — but the whole country will applaud the prompt and effective action that he has taken and that all of us share his horror and repugnance for this abominable crime and the Syrian connection with it? Because of the serious implications for all civilised exchanges between nations, is my right hon. and learned Friend in close touch with all our allies as to the next steps that must be taken to deal with Governments who are actively engaged in terrorist activity around the world?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his support. As I said in my statement, we are in touch with other friendly Governments, including moderate Arab Governments, about the way in which to handle this problem in the future as well as up to now. One returns to the central proposition that the principles of our response are not in doubt. We must improve the detailed extent to which we co-operate with each other in the sharing of information, in the preparation of warnings and in the extent to which we support each other by taking the necessary action in proven cases. We shall certainly press for an appropriate response in this case, but I must confess that I am by no means certain that we shall get as universal a response as I would wish. I shall do my best to achieve it.

Dr. M. S. Miller (East Kilbride): The Secretary of State must be commended on the action which he has announced. Is he aware that many of us recognise the even-handed attitude which Her Majesty's Government adopt to middle eastern problems and that the decision which he has announced today could not have been taken lightly? Therefore, it must have rested upon conclusive evidence in the Government's possession. May I also commend to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the suggestion made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) that the Soviet Union be brought into the matter? The Soviet Union holds the key to the problem which has been shown by Syrian involvement in this matter. Does the Secretary of State agree that the Soviet Union does not wish to be a party to international terrorism and would assist if it was brought into the discussion on this serious matter?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for endorsing the balanced way in which we have tried to approach this and similar matters. It cannot be made too plain that we remain determined to play our full part, with moderate Arab states and others, in the search for a peaceful settlement to the problems of that region. We are determined to achieve such co-operation as we sensibly can with the Soviet Union in that respect as well.

It is no secret that the attitude of the Soviet Union has been changing in relation to these matters. There has been a well-known connection between the Soviet Union and Libya over many years, but that has not enabled the Soviet Union, if she wished, to achieve the restraint that we would all have wished from Libya. So one must be cautious about expecting too total a conversion, but it is certainly right to take advantage of the renewed willingness of the Soviet Union to address herself to these matters seriously.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): Before we allow ourselves to wallow in an orgy of self-congratulation, may I put one or two points to my right hon. and learned Friend? There are some rather odd points about all this and they need to be answered. He talks about controls on airlines, but has he considered the fact that the bomb in the bag was apparently carried through all the checks at Heathrow, which have been particularly stringent of late, and was discovered by members of the El Al staff in the El Al departure lounge? If my right hon. and learned Friend is thinking of putting controls on an airline, might he not ask himself or the authorities at Heathrow whether something else needs to be done to see that bombs do not get through all the normal checks into a departure lounge, if that is indeed what happened?

My right hon. and learned Friend said that Hindawi went to the Syrian embassy. Are we to believe that part of the plot involved Mr. Hindawi walking through the front door of the Syrian embassy in Belgrave square? If the circumstances are as they have been described to us, I find them slightly unusual.

Finally, I wish to draw a serious matter to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend. On 10 October an article by David Watt appeared in The Times under the headline

"What shall we do about Syria?"

It was a straight lift from the prosecution case in the trial and seemed to me quite clearly likely to pervert the jury in what it was trying to do. That was accompanied by the expulsion of six Syrians from this country. I ask my right hon. and learned Friend at least to get the Attorney-General to discuss with The Times newspaper whether it is appropriate that such one-sided articles should appear in the middle of a trial when they could undoubtedly do nothing but affect the jury.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am sure that the House can often look with confidence to my hon. Friend to prevent us from indulging in an orgy of self-congratulation. A number of the points that he has raised deserve to be considered by the appropriate authorities. His first point about the control and surveillance of luggage at London airport will no doubt be considered in the light of all the evidence in the case.

My hon. Friend asked about Hindawi's access to the Syrian embassy and whether he passed through the front door, but I am not in a position to answer that question precisely. My hon. Friend is certainly right to say that there are a number of slightly unusual features about this case.

The article by Mr. David Watt in The Times was only one of a number of articles that have been written during the trial, some of them quite recently, speculating on what would be the appropriate reaction by the Government if a conviction were recorded. In so far as those had or may have had any bearing on the conduct of the trial, one would normally expect that point to be directed to the attention of the court either by the very experienced trial judge or by the very experienced defence counsel. As far as I know, that did not happen in this case.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): Has the Foreign Secretary any evidence or suspicion that diplomatic bags were used to smuggle terrorist items into the Syrian embassy? Even if it does not apply in this case, following the departure of the Syrian people, are there not grounds for reopening the discussion about whether diplomatic bags should be searched as a matter of routine? The documents in the bags would not be read and would be kept confidential, but such searches should be carried out, possibly in the presence of representatives of the embassies to which the bags were sent.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As far as I know, there is no evidence in this case bearing on that problem. In a sense, that highlights the importance of the point put by the hon. Gentleman. He will recall that the question was carefully considered by the Foreign Affairs Committee about 12 months ago and by the Government at the time. But the problem remains that, if the legitimate value of immunity from inspection for diplomatic bags is not to be challenged and overthrown worldwide, one must stop short of committing search as a general rule. I believe that the Foreign Affairs Comittee endorsed our view that in certain exceptional circumstances, where danger to human life is anticipated, the right to search may arise. I do not think that the debate has yet advanced beyond that, but I am aware of a continuing interest in this question on both sides of the House and outside this country. It is extremely difficult to see how we can advance beyond the position defined by the Select Committee.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the House will wish him to convey our thanks, and those of the country, to those whose vigilance prevented a tragedy and to those whose diligence brought this man to justice? Is he further aware that the vast majority of our fellow citizens wish to maintain friendly relations with the moderate people of the Arab world? However, at the same time we have had more than enough of our country being used as a battleground for warring factions in the middle east. Consequently, we warmly welcome the court's sentence and the diplomatic action that my right hon. and learned Friend has taken today.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, as it is right to remind me to convey the thanks and congratulations of the House to all those who detected the crime and brought it successfully to a conclusion in a court of justice. My hon. Friend was also right to underline the point that I have already made twice, that we certainly wish to co-operate with all members of moderate Arab countries in order to try to bring about a solution to the problems of the middle east. That must involve a willingness to approach the matter in an even-handed fashion and to require Israel as well as the Arab countries continually to readdress the fundamental injustices in the region. Only if we tackle the root causes can we be confident of having destroyed the atmosphere in which terrorism can so easily breed.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): What is the size of the British community in Syria? What steps have been taken to notify it of the Government's decision to close the embassy in Damascus? What steps will the Foreign Secretary be taking to protect the interests of the British community between now and the embassy's closure in 14 days' time?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising those points. The British community in Syria is approximately 250-strong. Through Her Majesty's ambassador in Damascus, we have made it clear to the Syrian authorities that we hold them responsible for guaranteeing the continued safety of the British community there. In response, the Syrian Government have confirmed that they will continue to take responsibility for the safety of British lives and property in Syria. Even so, British citizens must understand that if they decide to travel to, or reside in Syria, they do so on their responsibility and that of the Syrian Government. We intend to establish an interests section in Damascus under the auspices of a protecting power, but it is important to be clear that such representation cannot provide the full range of consular protection.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath): Is it not clear that the Government should be supported for reluctantly taking this step? Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that Syria is a major factor in the Lebanon, the Gulf war and in the search for a settlement to the Palestinian question? When the dust has settled, a certain amount of damage limitation will be called for by my right hon. and learned Friend and his colleagues if Britain's trade with that part of the world is not to be adversely affected. Will he confirm that the vast majority of Palestinians on the occupied west bank and in Gaza are totally opposed to international terrorism?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: One of the ironic tragedies of terrorism is that in virtually every case it is not endorsed or welcomed by those on whose behalf it is deployed. I have met Palestinians on the west bank and my impression is that they recognise the extent to which their cause is damaged by its identification with terrorism. My hon. Friend is right to point out that Syria is, and will remain, an important power in the region. We have no wish unnecessarily to increase tension there. The fact is that any damage at this stage to bilateral relations is the responsibility and fault of the Syrians and not ourselves. I hope that as a result of this the Syrian Government will realise the strength of the sense of revulsion in Britain and the rest of the world against terrorism and states that give support to such terrorism. We look forward to being able to co-operate with Syria, as with every other state in the region, in helping to solve difficult problems.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Will the Secretary of State accept my assurance, as a London Member of Parliament, that Londoners will welcome any effective measures that the Government can take to convince foreign Governments that their diplomatic missions in London should be used for that purpose and that purpose only and not used ever again as bases for international terrorism or threats to the life and limb of people who live in London, or as bases from which to harass students and citizens of other countries whose diplomatic missions are located in London? Will he also accept that the application of one single rigorous standard will help in that, because we cannot have a double standard? We must be opposed to Syrian terrorism in London and, equally strongly, to French terrorism in New Zealand.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I cannot on an occasion such as this be drawn into commenting on questions of a different and more complicated nature, whether or not the hon. Gentleman is a London MP. I am certainly ready to endorse the observations made by the hon. Gentleman. It is of the utmost importance that Governments should take effective action so far as they can to prevent terrorism bursting on the streets and citizens of our capital city and any other in the world. In trying to do that, it is important to apply a uniform standard. This Government have done and will continue to do everything that can be done in that direction.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The statement has already run for half an hour. In view of the importance of the subject, I shall call hon. Gentlemen who have risen, but I ask them to put their questions briefly.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): My right hon. and learned Friend will be aware that, following the sentence on Hindawi of 45 years, there is some concern that Abu Nidal might seek to take reprisals against bases in Cyprus or British legations around the world or in London. Can my right hon. and learned Friend advise me what steps, if any, have been taken regarding that matter? What action would the Government take if such steps were taken by the Syrian Government?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I think my hon. Friend is right in underlining the anxiety that must be felt about the risk of reprisals as a result of such action in any circumstances. Our response to that is twofold: first, we must make it plain that the Government cannot and will not flinch from doing what must be done in such cases because of fear of reprisal. To adopt any other attitude would positively encourage terrorism. Secondly, we must take the fullest possible range of precautions, especially for premises overseas, to protect those who might be threatened by reprisals. Sadly, so long as terrorism remains a threat, one cannot produce a complete guarantee against it.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on his robust and prompt action and join others who have done so. I ask him what measures he is taking to ensure that people who are appointed here in a diplomatic role are bona fide diplomats and are not in some way agents of either their secret service or terrorist organisations. Is he making certain that all diplomats are properly vetted before they are accepted as proper representatives of their country in London?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his opening remarks. He is right to draw attention to that point which, as he knows, was considered by the Foreign Affairs Committee. We seek to scrutinise the qualifications of those appointed to diplomatic positions in this country with those factors in mind, with particular vigilance where there is special reason to do so, and take action as appropriate. This case will serve to underline the need for further care and vigilance in that respect.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): In congratulating my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary on the robust and swift way in which he has handled the matter, will he assure the House that if, as has come to light in the past few weeks of the trial and the heightened interest in the matter, there is any evidence that there is terrorist activity being run from other embassies in London, regardless of where they come from, he will not hesitate to act again?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am sure that the House will need no reminding of the extent to which we seek to apply a uniform standard in relation to all these matters. Terrorism, especially if it is promoted or provoked by diplomatic misconduct, cannot be tolerated.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that to say to him that his action will meet with virtually universal approval in this country is not, as has been suggested, to wallow in congratulation but simply to state a fact, a fact which I feel sure will be recognised by the tacit support and understanding of responsible Governments in the Arab world? In view of the notorious record of the Alawite regime in Syria, whose sinister activities have gone unpublicised and unpunished for far too long, will my right hon. and learned Friend ensure that our security forces will now be placed on an exceptionally high level of alert against further possible Syrian terrorist action?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am sure that my hon. Friend is right to underline the importance of precautionary action of the sort that he has described. It is right that we should be especially vigilant in our security precautions at this time. It is right also that we should continue to leave the Syrian Government in no doubt of our abhorrence of terrorists and those who support them. We have discussed this through normal channels, as it were. I have done so myself with more than one Syrian Foreign Minister and with the Syrian president. Sadly, the earlier discussions do not seem to have been taken to heart.

Mr. Favell (Stockport): What can the civilised world do about those who indulge in barbaric behaviour and skulk behind diplomatic immunity?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): You will get £64,000 for answering that.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) for an unusually helpful and encouraging observation. The irony of the problem is that diplomatic immunity, properly exercised, is essential to the conduct of representation of Governments around the world, which is in itself essential if we are to be in a position to safeguard the interests of our citizens who travel overseas. When it is abused, however, the civilised world collectively has to make plain its determination not to tolerate such abuse. The United Kingdom and Her Majesty's Government have been in the forefront of encouraging the acceptance of that standard, sadly, perhaps, as a result of our exposure to abuse of diplomatic immunity. We shall continue pressing the case.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): As diplomatic immunity and privileges have been used traditionally to allow diplomats to report back to their Governments privately and thereby retain the good relations of which candid knowledge must be a part, have not diplomatic immunities and privileges been used increasingly in recent years for a far more sinister purpose, which is to undermine, subvert and even directly attack host countries? Therefore, has not the time come for us, in consultation with our friends and allies, to reconsider once again the scope of these immunities? It seems to me and to many others that the Syrian ambassador, whom we have just expelled, has as much in common with the traditional notion of diplomacy as, for example, the vicious armed robber who breaks into the back of a house has in common with a door-to-door salesman who knocks politely on the front door?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend, as always, has a gift for apt analogy and argument. It must be understood that when I stand at the Dispatch Box as the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and speak in justification of diplomatic immunity, I do not make the point on behalf of myself, my Department or my office. I do so because of the necessity to have immunity that covers legitimate diplomatic activities around the world. Having said that, there is a growing concern about the scale, nature and extent of abuse of these immunities. That is something that has preoccupied the House many times and an issue that the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs has considered in depth over the past 12 months. The conclusion which the Select Committee arrived at was not that immunities should be stripped away, nor that we should seek to negotiate internationally to limit them. I think that it would be almost impossible to achieve international agreement on this issue. We should be profoundly vigilant in our surveillance and about the abuse of those immunities. We should encourage other nations to be similarly vigilant and intolerant of abuse. That is precisely what we have been doing. We shall be firm and vigilant in our actions in relation to abuse and we shall continue to promote a comparable response from other countries. There is no alternative way that is tolerable, not only for the sake of diplomats, but for citizens, to prevent it altogether.

Mr. Rob Hayward (Kingswood): In reply to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), my right hon. and learned Friend gave some advice to British citizens who are still resident in Syria. Is any advice being given to companies with substantial business interests in Syria? In particular, as we are not ceasing airline connections, is any advice being given to airline companies in relation to their employees?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I do not think that we have given any separate and specific advice at this stage because the decision has only just been made. We shall give consideration to all the possible implications that follow from this. We have given special advice to British citizens living in the Lebanon, reinforcing advice already given to people living there of the need in Lebanon in particular to observe a high level of caution and to consider carefully whether they have sufficient reason to remain there.

Structure Plan (Dorset)

Question again proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Maude.]

3.11 pm

Mr. Adley: I now resume with the 10 questions that I was about to put to my hon. Friend the Minister. I shall read them quickly to get them on the record.

One: what guidance, advice or recommendations emanate from the DOE to shire counties about the preparation by them of structure plans or revised structure plans?

Two: has the DOE any particular strategic planning recommendations to make to individual counties? If so, what are they for Dorset?

Three: what is the statutory position of shire counties regarding the preparation of revised structure plans?

Four: what account does the DOE take in assessing the progress on an agreed structure plan of the effect on the plan of DOE inspectors' or ministerial decisions on target overruns for housing completions?

Five: What account does the DOE take in assessing the progress on an agreed structure plan of the effect of deliberate over-building by one authority within the county on that county's housebuilding targets vis-a-vis the current structure plan?

Six: what effect, if any, does the content of a county structure plan or revisions thereto have on specific decisions by DOE inspectors in the case of appeals to the DOE following planning refusals by district councils in the relevant county?

Seven: does the DOE plan any changes in ministerial circulars to local authorities on housing and planning matters such as to influence local authority planning decisions on housing?

Eight: does the DOE plan any changes in ministerial circulars to local authorities on housing and planning matters such as to influence inspectors' attitudes and recommendations on planning appeals?

Nine: what effect will the "Future of Development Plans" have on the preparation by shire counties of their strategic plans, if the proposals therein ultimately result in legislation?

Ten: what account does the DOE take of direct representations from Members of Parliament, the public and district councils concerning structure plans and revisions thereto when county councils not only produce the plans but submit to the Department their assessment of public reaction thereto?

I have already given my hon. Friend written notice of those questions so he will not have needed to write them down in shorthand.

I wish again to put on the record the answer given to me by the Secretary of State on 23 July when I asked him:

"Will he confirm that the initiation of structure plans and, indeed, the initiation of the revision of structure plans, is primarily the responsibility of the county council, and not his Department? Will my right hon. Friend further confirm that his Department responds after the county council has produced its proposals, and does not pressurise county councils before they produce their proposals? Finally, will he confirm that Dorset county council's revised structure plan for south-east Dorset is entirely its own responsibility?"

The reply was:

"I can confirm that all that my hon. Friend says is entirely correct."—[Official Report, 23 July 1986; Vol. 102, c. 337.]

I submit that there is no substance behind Dorset county council's claim that the proposals in this revised structure plan are sponsored by or are the result of pressure from Her Majesty's Government. Furthermore, there is no logic behind the county council's claim that massive developments at Three Legged Cross, the Grange estate and Verwood, as proposed in the structure plan revision, would prevent development elsewhere. The logic of that argument can be shown to be quite silly. The county council claims that if these three huge new schemes are approved, the rest of Dorset will be able to shelter behind the planning refusals that may emanate from all the district councils in the areas outwith the three areas where major developments are planned. Yet all the evidence shows that each planning appeal is considered on its individual merits by the inspector.

If the county council gets away with what it is trying to foist upon my constituency, the green light will have been given to huge, unwanted developments that go way beyond anything contained in the 1980 structure plan. Thereafter, the rest of the county would still be open, on every single planning appeal, to the individual decision of the inspector and his assessment of Government policy as contained in ministerial circulars. That is why I stress the point that unless there is a change of ministerial circular we shall have the worst of all worlds if this plan is allowed to proceed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker) wishes to address the House and I know that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey), has given considerable thought to the reply that he is to make to the debate. My ambition is to give courage and strength to Dorset county councillors to reject these monstrous and wholly unwelcome proposals. My hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North has described them as a misguided and cowardly retreat from the 1980 structure plan and I concur wholeheartedly with him. Furthermore, the 1980 structure plan was drawn up by my hon. Friend the Minister's own Department.

The House is now considering the Housing and Planning Bill. Government policies for the inner cities under that Bill appear to be to seek to regenerate growth and investment in the inner cities. They seek to generate investment jointly between the public and private sectors. I applaud that aim wholeheartedly. That is why those parts of the Housing and Planning Bill that refer to development in the inner cities have received universal support in this House. However, the Government's planning policies are moving in precisely the opposite direction.

As for the planning policies that are being pursued by the Department, development resources are being concentrated in areas where there are easy pickings for developers. Instead of using tax incentives and the planning law to funnel development into the inner cities, we are giving the green light to developers to build in the lush suburban areas and in the more prosperous areas. Unless the Department changes its planning policy, we shall continue to channel investment into areas where, economically and socially, it is neither needed nor wanted. Thus, simultaneously, areas where development is needed will be deprived of investment for development projects. That is the broader point. I look forward very much to the answers that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will have to give on the points that I have raised in this debate.

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, for having given me permission to join in this debate. I am also extremely grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) for putting forward so eloquently and fully the case that concerns both his constituents and mine. He has already referred to some of the comments that I have made on the subject. I agree with everything that my hon. Friend has said in the debate.

The level of development in south-east Dorset is of great concern to all our constituents. This matter concerns not just Dorset, a very beautiful part of our island, but the south of England generally. What my hon. Friend said about general planning policy is of great concern to many other constituencies, as I am sure my hon. Friend the Minister knows.

We had a structure plan in 1980 and a detailed consultation exercise arrived at the level of development to be contained in it. Inevitably, there was a compromise. I gave evidence but that did not provide the complete answer and was not reflected in the structure plan. However, there was a compromise and a plan of the level of development.

Now we have a draft review which shows how great a retreat is being proposed by the county council from the level of development in that structure plan. The document is a grim warning that we may expect 62,000 new dwellings in the area by 1996 instead of the 35,000 that were intended under the 1980 plan. Rather than strengthen a policy of containment for which there was widespread support by councillors and members of the public at every level in Dorset this document suggests an about-turn. It recommends an average building rate of about 2,350 dwellings a year instead of reducing that rate to 1,400 a year in line with the 1980 plan.

The recommendations are made for two reasons. The first is that somehow an increase in development in that part of the country will produce an increase in the number of jobs. If the review document is examined it will be seen that it contains the greatest amount of cold water for that proposal. There is no proven connection between a high level of development of residential houses—the kind of overdevelopment that concerns me—and the creation of jobs.

The second reason for the recommendations being made is, as my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch said, that it is a matter of Government policy. That is why we are having this Adjournment debate today. We want to get it clear that the Government do not have a policy of overdevelopment, as I see it from the document, of south-east Dorset. I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will reassure us on that.

Indeed, the review document brings into question the whole purpose and status of structure plans and that is why my hon. Friend has asked his 10 important questions. We shall be listening carefully to the answers that we receive. What I conceive to be overdevelopment is not any development, sensible infilling, allowing businesses to develop sensibly or the prevention of businesses from setting up in the middle of towns and perhaps even villages, as suitable, to create jobs; it is the wholesale imposition of large new estates, often without the infrastructure being properly prepared, which changes the nature of the countryside in our county against the wishes, and, indeed, the consciousness, of the people. We do not know that these great changes are going on until it is too late.

I have asked what the Government's policy is, and that is what we want to hear today. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister has seen the speeches made by the previous Secretary of State for the Environment. Those speeches, certainly as I read them, would not favour the kind of overdevelopment with which we are now threatened.

The county council has put to me the contents of some of the circulars coming from the Department of the Environment. In particular, I draw the attention of the house to circular 15/84, entitled "Land for housing". The recommendations in that circular, which I have studied in detail, do not amount to Government approval for overdevelopment, as I have defined it. I do not have time to go through it in detail, but it is the contents of that circular that county councillors are telling me constitute Government approval for overdevelopment.

The circular covers the whole country. It applies to the nation, not just to rural areas such as mine or to suburban areas such as south-east Dorset. I ask the Minister seriously to consider amending the circular to make it clear how he differentiates between different types of land.

My local council complains that its planning decisions are overturned. Perhaps the Minister will produce figures showing that relatively few decisions are overturned. Figures sometimes mean very little because they can cover up the number of developments that take place. More important than the precise number of decisions overturned is the effect on local authority morale and the threat that they feel the planning department makes. If local authorities believe that their decisions will be overturned, that will affect the way in which they make decisions.

I do not have time to quote from all the papers in my possession, but they illustrate how district councils in my constituency, particularly Wimborne district council, feel fettered by the threat of the Department of the Environment overturning their decisions.

Land is our most precious asset. We need a more detailed policy on land use. I hope that in current and future planning policies the Minister will differentiate between areas. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley), I hope that he will help to reverse the trend to the south which is draining resources from parts of the country that need them and which is damaging the environment in the south.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Richard Tracey): I know that the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) will be grateful to him for introducing this important debate, and to my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker). I congratulate them both on the detailed but measured way in which they presented their case.

Concern about the planning of such an attractive area is well appreciated. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch raised the matter on the Adjournment as recently as June last year.

My hon. Friend asked a number of questions and I shall endeavour to answer them in the time available. I shall write to him about those that I cannot cover. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I are always ready to continue the dialogue on general policy in correspondence and in person.

First, I shall go over the background to the south-east Dorset structure plan. It was approved in February 1980. It proposed about 35,000 new dwellings over the 20 years from 1976 to 1996. To achieve that would entail a reduction in the annual house building rate from 3,100 in 1976 to less than half that towards the end of the plan period. It was expected that 10,500 houses would be built on small infill sites within the urban area and the balance on larger sites mainly on the edge of the conurbation. Industrial and warehousing land was proposed at several locations and in broad terms the plan established a green belt.

When approving the plan, the Secretary of State acknowledged its uncertainties and emphasised the importance of monitoring. Dorset county council has been deligent in this and has published annual reports. Its latest figures confirm that housing development has exceeded the rates that were assumed in the plan. By March 1985, 28,200 dwellings had been built. Development of large sites has been broadly as expected, but development of small sites within the urban area has taken place much more rapidly than was originally assumed.

This experience and the shortening horizon of the plan prompted the county council to proceed with its review.

The county council says that it framed its strategy within the constraints of national and local factors. It points out the difficulties of implementing a policy of restraint while contending with the inherent attractions of the area, high house prices and the effect on the local economy. The proposed alteration is said to have attempted to balance these issues and to have been determined in relation to the capacity of the area to accommodate growth. The draft proposals provide for 34,300 new dwellings from 1985 to 2001. That is an average of 2,140 house completions per annum. Of this total, infilling and consolidation of development is expected to provide for 26,800 dwellings.

The county council considered two general areas for longer-term development, of which one, the north-east sector, was expected to provide about 14,000 dwellings eventually, only about 7,500 of which are expected to be built by 2001, provided there are satisfactory arrangements for infrastructure. The procedures for the alteration of the structure plan are essentially the same as when the plan was first prepared. Dorset county council has consulted the public on its draft alterations. This is a statutory requirement and six weeks are allowed for representations. However, the council felt it prudent to go beyond the legal requirement and allowed over 13 weeks for comment. The council has now made it known that representations after that date will still be considered.

The county council will now have to consider the responses to its publicity. I trust it will take careful note of all the representations that it receives. When the council have completed this process, the alteration will be submitted to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for his approval. At that stage another period of six weeks is allowed for the public to submit objections or representations direct to the Secretary of State for his consideration. These will be carefully examined and the Secretary of State may arrange for an examination in public to be held under an independent chairman. If, after considering the report of the panel and all the objections, the Secretary of State proposes to approve the alteration with modifications, there will be public advertisement and again six weeks will be allowed for objections. At all stages of the procedure there will be adequate opportunity for the general public to express their views.

My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) asked how the Department treats direct representations from hon. Members and from the public and district councils when structure plans are revised. The county planning authority is responsible for publicity and public consultation, but under the Act my right hon. Friend has to be satisfied by the steps taken by the authority to meet those requirements. As my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch knows, objections and representations by the public can be made to the Secretary of State when the county council formally submits an alteration for approval. All representations received are given the most careful scrutiny before a final decision is made.

I will now deal with some of the other questions. My hon. Friends asked what guidance was given by my Department to county councils on the review and alteration of their structure plans. First I should explain that the legislation itself requires county planning authorities to keep their structure plans under review. This is not a procedure that has to be carried out at set intervals. I imagine it is self-evident why this should be so. We live in a rapidly changing world. It is important that planning policies are relevant and take account of the most recent information available. There is no statutory restriction on when county councils may propose alterations to their structure plans. They have been encouraged to do so when events have changed or when plans do not look sufficiently far ahead.

When altering their structure plans, county councils should have regard to Government policy. That is made public in circulars issued by my Department. In particular, we issued circular 22/84 in September 1984 which contains detailed advice in a memorandum on structure and local plans. I commend that memorandum to my hon. Friends for it explains a great deal more about the procedures than I can possibly cover this afternoon.

Our circulars on land for housing — No. 15/84, mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North—and green belts—No. 14/84—are relevant. The Government wish to encourage home ownership and to bring that within the reach of as many people as possible. We also want structure plans to be helpful towards the creation of employment by not imposing unnecessary restrictions on businesses. The planning system should cater effectively for private housing and ensure an adequate supply of land. The Government also intend—I emphasise this — that well established conservation policies should be firmly maintained. In essence, our aim is to accommodate necessary development in ways that protect amenity and ensure economy and efficiency in the use of land.

It is recognised that the planning system has served those purposes well in the past, and in ways that meet both local interests and those of the community at large. That is the challenge that county councils face when they propose to alter their structure plans and which my right hon. Friend will be concerned to see fulfilled when he approves them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch asked further whether my Department had any particular strategic planning recommendations for Dorset. The strategy which the county council adopts in the structure plan is a matter for the county council itself. The circulars I mentioned provide guidance, as do nationally produced statistics and projections, but it is then for the county council to decide how best it should plan its area and to provide the reasons for its chosen course. Objections and representations can be made about these matters and my right hon. Friend will have to decide on them later when the alterations are submitted for his approval. It would not be right to prejudice such a decision at this stage.

My hon. Friend asked about the recent Green Paper on the future of development plans. As is known, the present development plan system of structure and local plans is under review and the Government have proposed the changes set out in the Green Paper. These changes are necessary because it takes too long to prepare plans, many plans are too detailed and the system requires too much involvement by central Government in approving structure plans. I am sure that my hon. Friend will understand that I do not have time today to talk in detail about the proposed changes, but what I will say, however, is that the proposals would require legislation and none is expected in the next Session of this Parliament. Because of that, I would like to emphasise that for the present the preparation of structure plan alterations, and their submission to the Secretary of State, will continue as before.

My hon. Friend said that Dorset county council felt obliged to propose a large increase of housing over the 1980 structure plan directly and solely as a result of Government policy. It is true that the county councils have to keep their structure plans up to date. That is a statutory requirement. But I say again that the timing and content of the proposed alteration is entirely a matter for the council. It decided that the 1980 plan should be revised because of the need to extend it beyond 1996 to ensure a continuing framework for local planning and investment; to cater for changes concerning the creation of employment and provision of services, and to reflect an increased level of housing demand.

Dorset county council has said in its consultation document that the choice of housing strategies has been constrained by a number of local and national issues, including Government policies. This is right, and reflects the advice given in our circulars, in particular those that I have mentioned. The county council also points out that its strategies take account of the views of the local public, the nature of the areas and existing policies and commitments. The decision to propose an alteration to the structure plan appears to be based on a comprehensive cross-section of advice and opinion. I can understand from what my hon. Friend has said that he questions that, and naturally we shall look extremely closely at those points.

My hon. Friend asked what account is taken of the effects of inspectors' and ministerial decisions on the progress of a structure plan. There appears to be some misunderstanding. The housing provisions of structure plans are not targets but the basis on which the planning of land availability and infrastructure can be made.

I fear that I shall not be able to answer precisely all the questions, but I can refer to the important one about Hurn airport. The inspector has submitted his report to my right hon. Friend for consideration, and all the representations made in writing and at the inquiry will be taken into account. Those points in the questions put to me by my hon. Friend that we consider need to be dealt with in more detail will be answered on paper. I repeat that my right hon. Friend and I are always available to hear from my hon. Friend and concerned hon. Members representing the county.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at nineteen minutes to Four o'clock.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Surplus Food

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what provision has been made in the revised European Economic Community budget for 1986 for the storage, disposal and destruction of food surpluses; and what was the comparable figure for 1985 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Jopling: The table sets out Community expenditure on public storage and disposal of products in structural surplus—cereals, sugar, milk products, beef and wine—and on withdrawals from the market of fish and fresh fruit and vegetables.

	Storage (mecu)	Disposal (mecu)	Withdrawals (mecu)*
1985	1,299	11,165	230
†1986	1,308	12,629	283

Notes:

* In some circumstances withdrawn produce finds no end use and has to be destroyed although the expenditure involved is not separately identified in the relevant Community statistics.

† 1986 figures are taken from the supplementary budget proposed by the Commission. The overall provision for the EAGGF guarantee section in the final adopted budget exceeded the Commission's proposal by 1985 mecu. Details of the precise allocation of this extra sum have not yet been published. 1984 and 1985 figures are taken from Commission financial reports.

Welsh Language

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the leaflets, forms or any other material which his Department publishes in Welsh or in bilingual Welsh/English format.

Mr. Jopling: None. Publication of leaflets, forms and any other material in Welsh is the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Wales.

Pollution (Compensation)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is Her Majesty's Government's policy regarding claims for compensation to United Kingdom farmers from the Government of the polluting country in the case of pollution from a foreign source; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Chernobyl Incident

Mr. Kennedy asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he has had with other European Community member states on the question of agricultural compensation arising from the income losses associated with the Chernobyl incident; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Kennedy asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he proposes to take, in his capacity as President of the European Community Council of Ministers, to co-ordinate claims on behalf of European Community agriculture against the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics for income loss associated with the Chernobyl incident; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Kennedy asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has as to steps taken by other European Community member states to aid financially the agricultural sectors in those respective states for income losses associated with the Chernobyl incident; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Spain (Imports)

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his assessment of the effect on the competitive position of United Kingdom exporters of barley to Northern Spain of the insistence by the Spanish Government that goods can be shipped only by vessels under the Spanish flag.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will make immediate representations to the European Economic Community Commission following the decision by the Spanish Government to accept imports of feed barley by ship only on vessels with a Spanish flag.

Mr. Moore: I have been asked to reply.

The Spanish Government have for many years reserved the carriage of certain cargoes, including barley, to vessels with a Spanish flag. However, I am pressing hard within the European Community for agreement on a proposed freedom to provide services regulation which would among other things put an end to discriminatory cargo reservation measures such as these.

Irradiated Food

Mr. Freeson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what action is being taken to ensure that irradiated foods are not being imported into the United Kingdom for sale for human consumption contrary to the United Kingdom Food (Control of Irradiation) Regulations;

(2) what practical means of detection of irradiation are available to ports authorities and trading standards officers to enable them to identify any irradiated foods being imported or offered for sale in the United Kingdom;

(3) how many samples of food were tested to detect any irradiation treatment at ports of entry into the United Kingdom since 1 January 1985; and what proportion of samples were found to have been irradiated.

Mr. Whitney: I have been asked to reply.

Responsibility for the enforcement of the Food (Control of Irradiation) Regulations 1967, as amended, is vested in the port health and local authorities. As yet there are no generally applicable chemical or physical tests, adequate for enforcement purposes, for identifying irradiated foods, but perusal of the accompanying documentation may reveal whether or not foods have been irradiated. No information is held centrally about the routine activities of enforcement authorities.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Board and Lodging

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what standards or minimum requirements currently exist in Northern Ireland covering the use of bed and breakfast accommodation and hostel accommodation; and whose duty it is to inspect and regulate the standards.

Mr. Needham: The requirements covering the use of bed and breakfast accommodation are set out in Statutory Rules and Orders of Northern Ireland 1953—No. 24 made under the Development of Tourist Traffic Act (Northern Ireland) 1948. It is the duty of the Northern Ireland Tourist Board to inspect tourist accommodation and to regulate standards.

Hostel accommodation is not normally registered as the Act exempts premises which are not operated primarily for gain and are run by a charitable organisation.

The Government recently published a proposal for a draft Health and Personal Social Services and Public Health (Northern Ireland) Order which will enable the Department of Health and Social Services to provide for the registration and inspection of common lodging houses by health and social services boards.

Mount Royal, Donaghadee

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the extent to which the proposal in planning application X/388/86 in respect of the development of 57 apartments at Mount Royal, Donaghadee, is consistent with the North Down area plan to which it relates.

Mr. Needham: This development proposal is consistent with both the existing North Down area plan and the new North Down and Ards area plan 1984-95 at present under preparation.

Psychiatric Nurses

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many whole-time equivalent community psychiatric nurses have been employed by each health authority in Northern Ireland from 1974 to the latest available date, broken down by (a) registered mental nurses, (b) registered nurses for the mentally handicapped, (c) state enrolled nurses with mental training, (d) state enrolled nurses with mentally handicapped training, (e) others and (f) total.

Mr. Needham: The information requested is as follows:

O-level Examination Results

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will make a statement on the O-level pass rate expressed as a percentage of the total school population in Northern Ireland at the latest date for which figures are available.

Dr. Mawhinney: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Conference

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what contribution the Anglo-Irish agreement conference is making to the reduction of sectarian discord and violence.

Mr. Tom King [pursuant to his reply, 16 July 1986]: The Anglo-Irish agreement, which established the Intergovernmental Conference, offers a framework within which people of both Unionist and Nationalist traditions in Northern Ireland can be reconciled and can recognise and accept each others' rights. It also offers important opportunities for co-operative effort with the Irish against terrorism. These aims cannot be achieved quickly; nor will the benefits of the agreement necessarily become clear in the short term. But I believe that no other way offers such a good prospect of achieving them.

Secretary of State (Interview)

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish in the Official Report the 18 complaints, objections and requests for clarification which the Irish Government have lodged with the Anglo-Irish secretariat in Belfast about an interview given by him to the Belfast Telegraph on Friday 4 July; what responses he is making to each of the 18 items; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tom King [pursuant to his reply, 17 July 1986]: I have nothing to add to the replies that I gave to questions by the right hon. Members for Strangford (Mr. Taylor) and Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason) on 18 July 1986.

Drugs

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the level and trends of misuse of drugs in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: [pursuant to his reply, 18 July 1986]: The level of drug misuse in Northern Ireland remains low by comparison with the rest of the United Kingdom. The number of persons charged or cautioned for offences relating to controlled drugs in 1985 was 286 compared with 227 in 1984, 182 in 1983 and 218 in 1982. The vast majority of these offences related to cannabis and there is no evidence of a major hard drugs problem.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Chernobyl Disaster (Compensation)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what negotiations there have been, and what negotiations have been arranged for the near future, with the Soviet Union over compensation for British farmers following the Chernobyl disaster.

Mr. Renton: On 10 July we formally reserved our right with the Soviet Government to claim compensation on our own behalf on behalf of our citizens for any losses suffered as a consequence of the accident at Chernobyl. The presentation of a formal claim, should we decide to make one, would not take place until the nature and full extent of any damage suffered had been assessed.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for what purpose two scientists are being sent to the Falkland Islands in connection with penquin deaths; what instructions have been given them as to the scope of their work; and what are the fields of specialist expertise of the scientists concerned.

Mr. Eggar: The Falkland Islands Foundation and the Falkland Islands Development Corporation have jointly funded a project for two scientists, a marine ornithologist and an assistant to study the feeding habits of seabirds around the Falkland Islands.

Foreign Policy (EC)

Mr. Foulkes: asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the declarations on foreign policy made jointly by the European Economic Community countries since political co-operation archives began.

Mrs. Chalker: Declarations on foreign policy made jointly by the Twelve are placed in the Library of the House.

ENERGY

Coal Consumption

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has about the amount of coal consumed by industry in the last year for which figures are available; if he is able to provide a breakdown according to the principal types of industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: The provisional figures for coal consumed by the principal types of industry in the United Kingdom during 1985 are:

	'000 tonnes
Iron and steel	30
Non ferrous metals	1,199
Cement and other mineral products	1,995
Chemicals	811
Mechanical engineering	124
Electrical engineering	23
Vehicles	231
Food, drink and tobacco	444
Textiles, leather and clothing	205
Paper, publishing and printing	546
Public administration	1,280
Agriculture	30
Miscellaneous	400
Other	1,847

South Africa

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will discuss with the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority the termination of South Africa's associate membership of the United Kingdom Atomic energy Authority's systems reliability service.

Mr. Goodlad: It is our policy not to assist in any way South Africa's nuclear programmes. South African membership of the UKAEA's systems reliability service is not being renewed.

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give details of the controls introduced to enforce the ban on new contracts for the sale and export of nuclear goods, materials and technology to South Africa, as agreed in the Commonwealth accord on Southern Africa adopted on 20 October 1985.

Mr. Goodlad: It remains United Kingdom policy not to supply any materials or equipment to South Africa which would aid her nuclear programme. This policy is exercised through the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1985.

Electricity Supply Regulations

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Energy when his Department will redraft and recirculate the proposals for new electricity supply regulations in the light of the comments received from the Electricity Consumers Council.

Mr. Goodlad: The redrafting will be carried out over the next few months in light of the many helpful and constructive comments that have been received from a number of bodies, including the Electricity Consumers Council. Interested bodies will be consulted further on specific issues during the redrafting.

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Energy why the 1937 electricity supply regulations are being redrafted; when the decision to redraft the regulations was taken; and on what date and at what stage in the redrafting process the views of the Electricity Council were sought.

Mr. Goodlad: Consideration has been given to this matter over a considerable period in view of developments since 1937. The Energy Act 1983 opened the way for increased private generation and this increased the need for revisions. Electricity Council staff took part in the early stages of the work following the Act but were not involved in decisions on, or the drafting of, the proposals which have been issued for general consultation. The council received the draft when this was circulated to other interested organisations.

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the energy organisations from whom comments were (a) requested and (b) received in the re-drafting of the electricity supply regulations.

Mr. Goodlad: The draft electricity supply regulations were sent to the following bodies with an invitation to comment and those marked with an asterisk have responded:

Coal Miners (Retraining)

Sir Ian Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Energy what retraining programmes for former coal miners have been submitted to the European Commission for funding under article 56(2)(b) of the European Coal and Steel Community treaty for each of the last six years; and what comparative information he has about schemes submitted in other Community countries.

Mr. David Hunt: In 1985 the National Coal Board introduced a new job and career change scheme (JACCS) under which it provides financial assistance for retraining redundant mineworkers, including the purchase of places on training courses. Discussions are in progress with the Commission on Community financial assistance towards the costs of JACCS.

I understand from the Commission that comparative data on coal industry retraining schemes submitted to them by other member states are not available.

Coal Industry Workers (Payments)

Sir Ian Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has as to how much money has been made available per coal industry worker in (a) France, (b) Belgium, (c) West Germany, (d) the United Kingdom in each of the last six years under article 56(2)(b) of the European Coal and Steel Community treaty, and as to the reasons for the differences between the several countries.

Mr. David Hunt: I understand from the Commission that the amount of coal readaptation aid made available.

in European currency units, from ECSC own resources to each member state in respect of the six calendar years ending 1984 was as follows:

	France		United Kingdom		Belgium		Germany
	Amount made available	In respect of number of workers	Amount made available	In respect of number of workers	Amount made available	In respect of number of workers	Amount made available	In respect of number of workers

1980			8,039,250	2,346	99,250	—	—	5,852
1982	—	—	34,328,500	6,880	—	—	6,748,500	4,644

In 1984 an additional 60 mecu were made available for coal social measures from European Community general resources, of which France was allocated 15·4 mecu, the United Kingdom 23·1 mecu, Belgium 1·0 mecu and Germany 20·5 mecu.

The amounts made available to each member state reflect the differing circumstances of their coal industries and the particular national support measures in force.

(2) what discussions he has had recently with the United Kingdom Solar Energy Society on energy technology options;

(3) what discussions he has had recently with Friends of the Earth on energy technology options;

(4) what discussions he has had recently with the Cambridge energy research group on energy technology options;

(5) what discussions he has had recently with SCRAM (Edinburgh) on energy technology options;

(6) what discussions he has had recently with the Parliamentary alternative energy group on energy technology options;

(7) what discussions he has had recently with the British renewable energy forum on energy technology options;

(8) what discussions he has had recently with the Open University energy research group on energy technology options;

(10) what discussions he has had recently with the network for alternative technology and technology assessment on energy technology options;

(11) what discussions he has had recently with the national centre for alternative technology on energy technology options.

Mr. David Hunt: My Department holds frequent discussions with representatives of a wide range of alternative energy interest groups. During the past few months these have included the Open University, the British Wind Energy Association and the Parliamentary Alternative Energy Group.

Offshore Licensing Revenue

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish in the Official Report figures to show the total amounts received in the financial year 1985-86 from their share of offshore licensing revenue by (a) the Isle of Man and (b) Northern Ireland.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The total amounts received by the Isle of Man and Northern Ireland during the financial year 1985-86 were respectively £2,786,226·45p and £80,511,191·67p.

North Sea Oil and Gas

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Energy what was the total amount and value in 1984-85 of (a) the oil and (b) the gas produced offshore in the North sea (i) north of latitude 55° 50′ and (ii) south of this latitude.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Reported sales of oil and gas produced from the offshore United Kingdom continental shelf in financial year 1984-85 were:

	Oil		Gas
	million tonnes	£ billion	billion m³	£ billion
North of 55° 50′	125·7	21·55	12·4	0·81

Plutonium

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will update to 31 March 1986 the information on the allocation of plutonium produced in the Central Electricity Generating Board and South of Scotland Electricity Board Magnox reactors given in reply to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy on 23 July 1985, Official Report, column 475.

Mr. Goodlad [pursuant to the reply, 26 June 1986, c. 269-270]: The table sets out the allocation or use of plutonium produced in the Magnox reactors of the SSEB and CEGB at 31 March 1986.

Allocation of plutonium produced in CEGB or SSEB Magnox reactors (position at 31 March 1986)

	Tonnes (to nearest half tonne)

(a) These figures are derived from the known tonnage of fuel elements and their estimated overall average irradiation and cannot be accurately calculated.

(b) As for (a). About 20 per cent. of amount shown was held by BNFL.

(c) and (d) This material is held at Sellafield on behalf of CEGB and SSEB.

(e) About 20 per cent. of amount shown was held by BNFL.

(g) The balance of plutonium produced in the boards Magnox reactors was consigned to the United States before 1971 under the United States/United Kingdom defence agreement, and as stated by the Prime Minister, on 21 April 1964, was used by the United States for civil purposes. Because of the barter arrangements under which plutonium was consigned, it would not be in the national interest to publish the figure.

Nuclear Accidents

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Energy, what account is taken in assessment by Her Majesty's Government and by the nuclear industry of the safety of nuclear installations in the United Kingdom, of the Rasmussen report on the probability of accidents of various types in reactors in the United States of America; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad [pursuant to the reply, 14 July 1986, c. 389]: Extensive safety studies have been carried out by the nuclear industry. These take account of the Rasmussen report and of other relevant research.

Alternative Energy

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will set out in tabular form the amount of investment on research, development and demonstration made by his Department, the Central Electricity Generating Board, the South of Scotland Electricity Generating Board, British Nuclear Fuels Limited, United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority and in collaborative projects with the European projects with the European Commission from 1975 to 1986, in relation to (a) thermal nuclear fission, (b) fast reactors, (d) coal burning for electricity generation, (e) combined heat and power technology, (f) active solar, (g) passive solar, (h) geothermal, (i) wind energy generation, (j) biomass energy, (k) wave energy, (l) tidal energy, (m) electricity conservation, (n) gas fired electricity generation and (o) oil-fired electricity generation.

Mr. David Hunt [pursuant to the reply, 14 July 1986, c. 387]: I have asked the chairman of the CEGB, SSEB and BNF plc to write to the hon. Member in respect of their expenditures. The table sets out expenditures by my Department for the period and categories requested, insofar as they are available:

[2] The figures from 1977-78 to 1984-85 also include expenditure on related safety R&D and on the operation of the Winfrith SGHWR and the Windscale AGR, where appropriate. Figures for 1975-76 and 1976-77 are not available on a comparable basis; those given do not include expenditure on safety related R&D.

[3] The figures for 1977-78 to 1984-85 also include expenditure on related safety R&D and on the operation of the Dounreay Prototype Fast Reactor. Figures for 1975-76 and 1976-79 are no available on a comparable basis; those given do not include expenditure on related safety R&D.

[4] The figures also include the contribution to the JET project, where appropriate.

[5] Expenditure 1975-76 to 1983-84 consisted of D/Energy's share of the United Kingdom's contribution to the IEA Pressurised Fluidised Bed Combustion (PFBC) project at Grimethorpe.

[6] RD&D in combined heat and power technology forms part of the total expenditure on energy efficiency RD&D. Except at disproportionate cost, it is not possible to show these figures separately. It is estimated that expenditure on CHP feasibility studies will have totalled 1·8 million in the period 1980-81—1985-86.

[7] Expenditures are shown for individual elements of the renewables R&D programme only and the figures do not include the cost of ETSU management services.

[9] RD&D in this category also falls within the total expenditure on energy efficiency RD&D and cannot, except at disproportionate cost, be shown separately

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Support for Innovation Scheme

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what level of expenditure has been allocated to the support for innovation scheme in each year since its inception in 1982; and what is projected expenditure on the scheme in cash terms and real terms, and indexed using 100 as a base.

Mr. Pattie: Net expenditure on support for innovation under the Science and Technology Act 1965 has been:

Outturn	£ million
1982-83	121
1983-84	200
1984-85	239
1985-86*	219

* Estimate.

Projected net expenditure on support for innovation is:

	1986-87 Provision	1987-88 Plan	1988-89 Plan
Cash terms (£ million)	224	232	243
Real terms (£ million)	224	224	228
Indexed	100	100	102

EUREKA

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give information available to him on the financial support schemes available for EUREKA projects in each of the EUREKA member states.

Mr. Pattie: EUREKA is not a funding mechanism, and public finance for EUREKA projects is a matter for individual national Governments. The available information on schemes in EUREKA member states is as follows:

Austria

1. Three funds are used to finance international projects, one of which—for the promotion and application of new technologies — would apply for EUREKA projects.

Belgium

2. Funding from existing schemes is available for EUREKA projects.

Denmark

3. Under existing schemes, loans of up to 50 per cent. are available for R and D projects (including EUREKA projects). Additional funds have been made available in 1986 for international R and D projects.

France

4. Within the budgets of the research, industry and PTT Ministers, funds have been allocated for EUREKA projects. The level of grants is up to 50 per cent., depending on the technical and commercial risk involved. In addition to the Ministries' budgets, the industrial organisation fund offers loans.

Germany

5. The normal arrangements for research funding apply to EUREKA projects, and funds have recently been earmarked for EUREKA. In sectors of major public responsibility, such as health, or environmental protection, public funding covers a significant share of the relevant research expenditure. For industrial projects funding can be provided for long-term and high risk R & D activities. Here, the Government contribute up to 50 per cent. of the relevant expenditure. Finance of up to 100 per cent. is available for public research institutes and universities from BMFT.

Finland

6. There is no special fund for EUREKA. Grants of up to 50 per cent. and loans of up to 75 per cent. may be available under existing schemes. In the case of large-scale university or research institute participation funding may be higher.

Greece

7. Funding is available from existing schemes. Loans for venture capital are under consideration.

Ireland

8. There is no special EUREKA fund at present. Grants of up to 50 per cent. are available from existing schemes.

Italy

9. Funding is available from existing schemes.

Luxembourg

10. There is no special EUREKA fund, nor are EUREKA projects accorded special treatment. Normal levels of funding would not exceed 50 per cent. The 50 per cent. is split so that up to 25 per cent. is provided through a subsidy, half of which is repayable in case of success, and up to 25 per cent. through a loan from the National Credit and Investment Corporation. In the case of feasibility studies, however, 50 per cent. through subsidy alone can be available.

Netherlands

11. Funding of projects is available from existing schemes. For 1986, however, a separate fund is available for feasibility studies.

Norway

12. For 1986, Norway has set aside special funds for industrial EUREKA projects.

Portugal

13. In 1986 a special EUREKA fund has been set aside. In addition, the Portuguese Development Bank has opened a special credit line to support innovative schemes, including those under EUREKA.

Spain

14. Under existing schemes loans at 7 to 11 per cent. are negotiated on a case by case basis. Interest and capital repayments are made when projects become profitable. The loans vary from 50 to 70 per cent.

Sweden

15. There is no special fund for EUREKA projects, nor are they given special preference. Current schemes may provide loans of up to 50 per cent. which attract nominal interest rates and are to be repaid if, and when, an individual project is successfully carried through. There is the possibility of tax credits under certain programmes.

Switzerland

16. There are no specific funds for EUREKA. Present schemes offer loans of up to 50 per cent.

Turkey

17. Turkey does not have special public funding arrangements for EUREKA projects, but the Government are considering the establishment of a special fund for supporting projects (national and international, including EUREKA) with high technology content. The Turkish Scientific and Technical Research Council gives grants to research institutes and individuals for R and D projects.

United Kingdom

18. The position of the United Kingdom is described in my reply to the hon. Gentleman's earlier question of today's date.

Pharmaceutical Products

Mr. Jackson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to introduce legislation to abolish the licence of right for pharmaceutical products.

Mr. Pattie: The Government intend to include legislation to relieve pharmaceuticals for human use from the licence of right of provisions of schedule 1 to the Patents Act 1977 in a Bill which will implement proposals in the White Paper "Intellectual Property and Innovation" (Cmnd. 9712). This Bill will be introduced as soon as the parliamentary timetable permits.

Coal Mining

Sir Ian Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which coal-mining areas of Great Britain benefit from assistance for new business development given under the European Coal and Steel Community treaty but are not eligible for assistance from the EEC regional Fund.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The following areas are recognised as priority areas by the European Coal and Steel Community but are not eligible for any assistance from the European regional development fund:

Northumberland (Part)
Leeds TTWA* (Part)
Castleford TTWA*
Wakefield TTWA*
Staffordshire (Part)
Nottinghamshire (Part)
Coalville TTWA*
Fife (Part)

*TTWA = Travel-to-work area as defined by Department of Employment prior to September 1984.

Companies (Development Area Assistance)

Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish in the Official Report the criteria for eligibility of companies applying for assistance to locate in development areas, intermediate areas or enterprise zones; and if account is taken of an applicant company closing a factory elsewhere in the United Kingdom or of any job losses thereby incurred.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The criteria for eligibility for regional development grants are published in appendix 4 of the annual report on the Industrial Development Act 1982, and for regional selective assistance in appendix 5.

When assessing the amount of regional development grant, account is taken of job losses in the assisted areas by the applicant or any associated undertaking as a direct result of the project. When assessing applications for regional selective assistance, account is taken of job losses elsewhere in the United Kingdom, with particular regard to losses within the assisted areas. Relocation projects where there is no net increase in jobs are normally excluded from regional selective assistance.

All industrial and commercial companies locating in enterprise zones (which are the responsibility of the Department of the Environment) are eligible for the benefits available in those zones. The scheme is administered by the local authorities concerned who apply criteria under schedule 32 to the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980.

Travel-to-Work Areas (Midlands)

Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which travel-to-work areas in the midlands are eligible for Government assistance as development or intermediate areas.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information is as follows:

Travel-to-work area	Assisted area status
Telford and Bridgnorth	Intermediate area
Wolverhampton	Intermediate area
Walsall	Intermediate area
Dudley and Sandwell	Intermediate area
Kidderminster	Intermediate area
Birmingham	Intermediate area
Coventry and Hinckley	Intermediate area
Gainsborough	Intermediate area
Corby	Development area
Cinderford and Ross-on-Wye	Development area

Development and Intermediate Areas (Assistance)

Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish in the Official Report the terms and amounts of Government assistance for new buildings, new machinery and training cost for personnel in development and intermediate areas.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Regional development grant is paid towards approved projects of investment in the development areas. Grant is assessed at the higher of

(i) 15 per cent. of eligible capital expenditure subject, where applicable, to a grant per job limit; and

(ii) £3,000 for each net new job created, subject, where application, to a limit imposed by the European Community.

Regional selective assistance can be paid to projects in both the development and the intermediate areas which satisfy the necessary criteria. Assistance normally takes the form of a project grant which is negotiated at the minimum level necessary to enable the project to go ahead on the basis proposed. It is subject to limits imposed by the European Community. Training grant may also be available up to a maximum of 40 per cent. of eligible training cost, subject to satisfying European Community requirements. This attracts a matching grant from the European social fund.

Elders XL Bid (Departmental Evidence)

Mr. Michael Cocks asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to the answer of 15 July to the right hon. Member for Bristol, South, what was the date on which his Department submitted evidence to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission in relation to the bid by Elders XL for Allied Lyons.

Mr. Howard: Written evidence was submitted on 10 February 1986.

Mr. Michael Cocks asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to the answer of 15 July to the right hon. Member for Bristol, South, if he will publish in the Official Report the evidence submitted by his Department to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission in relation to the bid by Elders XL for Allied-Lyons.

Mr. Howard: No. Evidence is submitted to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission in confidence. The commission may choose to quote from evidence in its report, but that is a matter for the commission.

Monopolies and Mergers Commission (Reports)

Mr. Michael Cocks asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to the answer of 15 July to the right hon. Member for Bristol, South, what criteria are used to decide what are the relevant factors in considering reports of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Mr. Howard: There are no rigid criteria. Careful consideration is given in each case to assessing which factors are relevant.

Lancashire Enterprises Ltd. (EC Funding)

Sir Russell Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he intends to review the funding made available under the European regional development fund textile fund non-quota section, BIS measures or other European regional development fund sources to Lancashire Enterprises Ltd.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Lancashire Enterprises Ltd. (LEL) has received several offers of grants under my Department's business improvement services schemes, and is eligible to make further applications while funds are available.

The future treatment of awards to LEL for infrastructure projects will depend on the outcome of the Department of the Environment's current review of local authority capital controls.

Post Office

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has set objectives for the Post Office.

Mr. Channon: I have today written to Sir Ronald Dearing, chairman of the Post Office, in the following terms.

"I believe that it would be helpful to you and your Board if I were to expose some of my thinking on the long term direction of the Post Office. In doing so, I have no wish to alter the relationship between the Post Office and the Secretary of State, which is established in existing legislation, nor to purport to assume or limit the Board's statutory responsibilities, nor to direct how they should be discharged. But Parliament has conferred powers on the Secretary of State and, without prejudice to my exercise of those powers in the light of circumstances prevailing at the time. I hope that it will be helpful to you to know the general considerations that will influence my view.

I would expect to see the Post Office continue on the course it has adopted towards the separation of the Royal Mails business, the Counters Service and National Girobank proceedings subsequently to the separation, where appropriate, of discrete business activities within Royal Mails. The financial and performance targets and the external financing limits set by the Government will increasingly reflect this enhanced separation. The Post Office should seek to develop its financial accounting for the discrete businesses within Mails as quickly as possible to the point that separate accounts are shown in the Post Office's published accounts. I regard these developments as desirable in themselves. I welcome the completion of action to establish Girobank as a Public Limited Company and I wish the Board similarly to press ahead with the incorporation of the Counters Business as a subsidiary company. I wish the Board to consider the further application of this principle to its other main activities.

To ensure the most responsive and efficient use of resources, I shall want continually to consider the possibilities for introducing private capital into Post Office activities and I should welcome your positive recommendations in this area. The Post Office should also regularly and critically appraise the scale and nature of the postal network against the background of technological and market developments.

I believe that the Post Office's prime objective must be to secure the maximum efficiency throughout the business by all practical means including, inter alia, sustained and detailed cost control of all aspects of the Post Office's activities and improved productivity. This will be reflected in the financial and performance targets and in the external financing limits set by the Government.

In improving the efficiency with which it uses its resources, the Post Office should reduce the real manpower and other costs of its services and thereby achieve at least the Government's efficiency targets, where set. It should do this while providing the quality of services which gives the best balance between the services provided and the costs of supplying it. In addition, the Post Office should pursue an investment programme designed to support the objectives set by the Government. This programme should be evaluated on the basis of appropriate investment appraisal techniques, designed to take advantage of technology where this can be demonstrated to produce adequate returns, satisfy any guidelines set down by the Government and have regard to financial limits set by the Government. The Post Office should also seek to realise the full potential of its workforce through the pursuit of productivity schemes and improved practices.

The Post Office should make a profit in each year in each of its constituent businesses sufficient at least to meet the Government's published financial targets and should make appropriate profits in those discrete activities subsumed within the wider targets. The Post Office should also seek to ensure that the main elements of its price structure are sensibly related to the costs of supply and the market situation and should avoid cross-subsidy, particularly from monopoly to competitive activities. In addition, the Post Office must continue the development of, and maintain, the necessary information and accounting systems to be able to ensure that it is following sound pricing principles, to ensure that it is able to monitor adequately the speedily the progress of each of its businesses, and in order to report performance through the published accounts.

The review of the business environment, the corporate plans and the examination of strategic options should have a central place in the relationship between the Post Office and the Government. The reivew of the business environment should be brought up to date and resubmitted to the Government each December. The corporate plans should be submitted each March. They should fully reflect the financial and performance targets and the external financing limits set by the Government.

The Post Office should ensure regular flows of information to the Government and meet the timetables settled with the Government to permit the monitoring of performance generally and specifically, both against the agreed strategies and in relation to the Government targets and external financing limits."

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Ethiopia

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the current situation in Ethiopia and the Sudan in regard to starvation, food stocks, international relief work and the level of British aid.

Mr. Eggar: Food aid pledges for Ethiopia more than cover the estimated requirements for this year. Widespread starvation has been averted, although the situation is critical in north western Welo. We have recently offered £250,000 towards the cost of air-dropping food to the isolated town of Sekota in this region. So far this year we have provided over £6 million bilaterally in emergency assistance in Ethiopia.

Sufficient food has been committed to meet all estimated relief needs in northern Sudan and starvation appears to have been arrested. The situation in southern Sudan continues to cause concern. We are supporting the efforts of the voluntary agencies to distribute food. We have provided over £5 million in bilateral emergency relief for Sudan this year in addition to our substantial longer-term development programme.

Joint Funding Scheme

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the Overseas Development Administration joint funding scheme is intended for development projects or emergency relief.

Mr. Eggar: Grants under the joint funding scheme support British voluntary agencies in carrying out projects aimed at longer term economic and social development.

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether any sums within the 1986-87 Overseas Development Administration joint funding scheme budget have been earmarked for work on human settlements during the international year of shelter for the homeless (1987).

Mr. Eggar: A grant of £16,500 has been made to the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless Trust in support of the school for self-help housing project in Colombia. A number of grants have been made to other British voluntary agencies in support of projects which include work on human settlements. These include projects being undertaken by:

OXFAM
Christian Aid
The Catholic Association for Overseas Development
SOS Sahel

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what figure he has announced for the 1986-87 Overseas Development Administration joint funding scheme budget; how much of the total budget has so far been allocated; and to which organisations.

Mr. Eggar: A provision of £5·3 million has been made for the joint funding scheme in the Supply Estimates for 1986-87. Those funds have been fully committed to individual allocations and spending will be kept under review in the light of progress on projects. The British voluntary agencies which have been allocated grants are:

Action Aid
Aga Khan Foundation (UK)
Appropriate Health and Rural Technologies Action Group
Associated Country Women of the World
British Red Cross Society
Catholic Institute for International Relations
Catholic Fund for Overseas Development
Christian Aid

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Personal Injury Cases

Mr. Janner asked the Attorney-General what is the average time between the issue and start of hearing in personal injury cases in the High Court during the last year for which figures are available.

The Attorney-General: In 1985 the estimated average waiting time between issue and writ and start of trial—or date of disposal—for personal injury cases set down for trial in the High Court was 115·5 weeks in London and 144·1 weeks in the rest of England and Wales, but these figures include cases which are settled in the early stages and those which are fought to a finish and culminate in a judgment.

John Mikkelson

Mr. Ground asked the Attorney-General when a decision will be made as to what criminal proceedings shall be brought in respect of the unlawful killing of John Mikkelson in July 1985.

The Attorney-General: The Director of Public Prosecutions is at present awaiting the completion of the transcripts of the evidence taken at the inquest on John Mikkelson. No decision can be taken until he has had an opportunity to consider those transcripts in conjunction with the evidence already submitted to him by the Metropolitan police.

PRIME MINISTER

Irish Nationals

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Prime Minister if she will list the rights to housing and social security benefits, and other benefits available to Irish nationals coming to the United Kingdom; how many of these rights are reciprocated by the Government of the Republic; and what discussions about them has taken place within the auspices of the Anglo-Irish agreement.

The Prime Minister: I assume my hon. Friend is referring to cash benefits available according to means. Under the Council of Europe convention on social and medical assistance, ratified by both the Republic of Ireland and the United Kingdom, Irish nationals legally in the United Kingdom are entitled to our social assistance benefits equally with and under the same conditions as United Kingdom nationals; British nationals are similarly entitled to benefits in Ireland. The main social assistance benefits in the United Kingdom are supplementary benefit, family income supplement and housing benefit. In Ireland the comparable benefits are supplementary welfare allowance and family income supplement. Housing costs are not met by a special housing benefit in Ireland but are taken into account in calculating entitlement to supplementary welfare allowance.

The provision of cash benefits has not been discussed within the auspices of the Anglo-Irish agreement.

South Africa

Mr. Fisher asked the Prime Minister (1) whether she will place in the Library the text of any letters whe has written or received from President Botha of South Africa in the last three months;

(2) how many letters she has received from President Botha in the last three months;

(3) how many letters she has written to President Botha in the last three months.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) on 17 July in column 580.

Mr. Speller asked the Prime Minister if she will list those restrictive economic measures recently taken by Her Majesty's Government in relation to South Africa.

The Prime Minister: In the past year, together with our European and Commonwealth partners, we have agreed on a range of restrictive measures. Those having an economic content are:

We do not sell arms or para-military equipment to South Africa;

we do not import arems or para-military equipment from South Africa;

we refuse to sell sensitive equipment to the South African police and armed forces;

we refuse to collaborate in South Africa's nuclear development;

we refuse to sell oil to South Africa;

we have banned all new Government loans to the South African Government and their agencies;

we have ended Government funding for trade missions to South Africa and for trade fairs in South Africa;

we have banned the import of all gold coins from South Africa.

Cabinet Office

Dr. McDonald asked the Prime Minister if she will publish in the Official Report, the costs of manning the Cabinet in 1985-86 and the number of staff employed; and if she will indicate the number of specialist or political advisers employed during that period.

The Prime Minister: The Cabinet Office's 1985-86 running costs, excluding the Management and Personnel Office, were approximately £14,116,000. There were 503 staff employed in post at 31 March 1986. No political advisers were employed. Three specialist advisers were employed on a fee-paid basis at various times in the financial year.

Income Tax

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Prime Minister, pursuant to her reply to the hon. Member for Kensington on 3 June, Official Report, column 433, what would be the additional costs in terms of revenue forgone if, instead of making all income other than the credits taxable, each individual, counting husbands and wives, separately, were allowed a non-transferable low income-tax exemption, similar to age allowance, of (a) £15, (b) £20 and (c) £25 per week.

The Prime Minister: [pursuant to her reply, 17 July 1986, c. 579]: The revenue costs of tax allowances at the specified levels are shown below. The offset to the cost resulting from withdrawing the allowance for those with larger incomes would depend on the level of the income limit and the marginal rate of withdrawal. The costs take account of progressive withdrawal of the exemption above the age allowance income limit of £9,400 per annum.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Lobbies

Mr. Hayward asked the Lord Privy Seal how many mass lobbies of the House of Commons have taken place during the current Session of Parliament.

Mr. Biffen: Thirty five.

WALES

Sheepmeat

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he last met leaders of the farmers' union in Wales to discuss the sheepmeat sanctions.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I last met leaders of the farmers' union in Wales to discuss the restrictions on 7 July. Officials have also reported to me the views expressed by the unions in meetings held last week.

Cystic Fibrosis

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all the centres in Wales which have the facilities for the prenatal testing of amniotic fluid for cystic fibrosis.

Mr. Mark Robinson: There are facilities for the prenatal testing of amniotic fluids for cystic fibrosis at the university hospital of Wales, Cardiff.

River Loughor (Road Bridge)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to the reply to the hon. Member for Gower on 17 April, Official Report, column 412, what information his Department holds on the tenders submitted, both conforming and alternatives, on the new road bridge over the River Loughor.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: None. This is a matter for the local highway authorities concerned.

Litter

18. Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales to what extent anti-litter campaigns are hampered by the non-availablity or shortages of suitable and adequate receptables for litter; and what steps he is taking to deal with this problem.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The provision of receptables for litter is a matter for Welsh local authorities.

Radioactivity

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the earliest time after monitoring radiocaesium levels in sheep and fodder crops that the results can be made known to the individual farmers concerned; what advance notice of monitoring is given to farmers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Every effort is made to agree with farmers one day in advance that samples should be taken for monitoring. Results of monitoring are normally available to the farmers concerned within three to four days.

Sheep (Ban)

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales, further to his answer of 9 July to the hon. Member for Ynys Môn, if he will lift the ban on the sales of ewes, as distinct from lambs, in the those areas still affected by the ban.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: No. although the highest levels of radiocaesium have been found in young lambs, monitoring has also revealed some examples of high readings in ewes. Restrictions must continue in order to avoid the possibility of such animals entering the food chain.

Cervical Carcinoma

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish for the following age categories (i) 15 to 24, (ii) 45 to 54, (iii) 55 to 64, (iv) 65 to 74 and (v) 75 to 84, the number of deaths from cervical carcinoma in (a) Wales and (b) each health authority in Wales for each year since 1979.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information is given in the table:

Perinatal Mortality

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report, for each of the past seven years, up to 1985, the perinatal mortality rate for (i) Wales and (ii) each area health authority in Wales.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Perinatal mortality rates for 1985 are given in the following table:

Perinatal mortality rate—1985*

	Number
Clwyd	10·9
East Dyfed	8·0
Pembrokeshire	†8·7
Gwent	10·2
Gwynedd	10·3

South Glamorgan	13·8
West Glamorgan	10·7
Wales	10·2

* Deaths per thousand total births.
† Rate calculated from less than 20 events.

Comparable figures for previous years have been published in "Health and Personal Social Services Statistics for Wales", Vols. 8-12, copies of which are in the Library.

Radiology Services (Neath and Port Talbot)

Mr. John Morris asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he is satisfied with the availability of staff and resources for the radiology services in Neath and Port Talbot; and whether any improvements are proposed.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The level of staff and resources for radiology services in the Neath and Port Talbot area is an operational matter for the West Glamorgan health authority to determine within existing manpower guidelines.

Perinatal Services

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will place in the Library a copy of the all-Wales perinatal initiative report on perinatal services.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I shall write to the hon. Gentleman.

National Health Service (Expenditure)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will set out the (a) gross and (b) net of charges expenditure, current and capital, on the National Health Service and personal social services for each year from 1971 to 1986-87 for Wales for (a) the hospital and community Health Service, (b) family practitioner committees and their predecessors, (c) centrally funded National Health Service services and (d) the PSS with the percentage increase deflated by (i) the gross domestic product, (ii) the retail price index and (iii) pay and prices.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Welsh Language

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing Government financial support for the Welsh language in each year since 1974-75 on a per capita Welsh speaker basis.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information about direct Government financial support for the Welsh language on a per capita Welsh speaker basis is given in the following table:—

1974-75	0·22
1975-76	0·22
1976-77	0·66

Executive Housing

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report a list of those organisations that expressed reservations regarding the existence of a genuine demand for sites for houses for executives.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Reservations were expressed by the following organisations:—
Town and Country Planning Association.
National Housing and Town Planning Council.
Royal Institute of Chartered Surveyors.
Countryside Commission.
Civic Trust for Wales.
Ramblers Association.
Welsh Office of the Association of District Councils.
Welsh Counties Committee.
Royal Town Planning Institute.
Council for the Protection of Rural Wales.
Incorporated Society of Valuers and Auctioneers.
Welsh District Planning Officers' Society.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report the date on which he first consulted each organisation before issuing Welsh Office circular 30/86 about housing for executives.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Organisations were first consulted on the draft circular on 9 December 1985.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will place a copy in the Library of the response from each organisation he consulted before issuing Welsh Office circular 30/86 about housing for executives.

Mr. Mark Robinson: It is not our intention as this would require the agreement of the organisations concerned.

Road Construction

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the extent and the planned cost of new motorway and trunk road construction to be undertaken in Wales during the next five years.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Planned expenditure for new construction and improvement of motorway and trunk roads in 1986-87 is £83·24 million. We have not yet made any decision for subsequent years on the distribution of block public expenditure resources. As indicated in tables 3 and 4 of "Roads in Wales 1985" it is hoped to start work on some 87 miles of new motorway and trunk roads by December 1990.

Llandeilo (Travel-to-Work Area)

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will consider making selective financial assistance available for the Llandeilo travel-to-work area;

(2) if he will consider making regional development grant available for the Llandeilo travel-to-work area.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: No. The present assisted areas map, which governs the availability of selective financial assistance and regional development grant came into force in November 1984 following a most comprehensive and objective review. Industrial investment decisions demand a substantial measure of stability in the map, and the Government have no plans for early changes to it.

Sheep Farmers (Anglesey)

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received about compensation for sheep farmers on Anglesey following the ban on sheep sales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have received representations about compensation from the unions and other interests in the industry. The Government have already made it clear that they will be prepared to consider compensating specific farmers for severe loss in particular circumstances. However, at this stage it is too early to assess the effect of the restrictions upon producers.

School Meals

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many children in Wales are currently in receipt of free school meals.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The latest available information, which relates to September 1985, indicates that 90,700 pupils at all maintained schools were then in receipt of free mid-day meals.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people are employed in the school meals service in Wales; and what are the corresponding figures for May 1979.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information is not available centrally.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many children in Welsh schools would lose free meals under the proposals within the Social Security Bill.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: An estimated 30,000, but most of these will be among the estimated 36,000 children who are expected to benefit from the cash compensation for school meals within the proposed family credit.

SCOTLAND

Drug Abuse (Borders Region)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what plans he has to counter drug abuse in the Borders region;

(2) what evidence he has of changes in the incidence of drug abuse in the Borders region in the last six years;

(3) what steps he plans to take to increase counselling facilities and anti-drug abuse education in the Borders;

(4) what projects are in operation in the Borders to help registered drug addicts;

(5) how many registered drug addicts reside in the Borders;

(6) how much is currently being spent on the prevention of drug abuse in the Borders region;

(7) what plans he has to increase funding for the Scottish Health Education Council specifically regarding tackling drug abuse in the Borders region.

Mr. John MacKay: The Government's strategy for tackling the problem of drug misuse and the wide range of positive measures which have been taken or put in hand are described in "Tackling Drug Misuse: A Summary of the Government's Strategy", the second edition of which was published in March 1986.

It is difficult to measure the extent of an illegal activity such as drug misuse, but the main indicators available centrally suggest that the incidence of drug misuse in the Borders region continues to be relatively low. Figures for the numbers of addicts formally notified to the Home Office are available only by police force areas.

NHS services for the treatment of drug misusers in the Borders area are provided as part of the general practitioner and hospital and community-based services.

The public information and education campaign mounted by the Scottish Health Education group on behalf of the Scottish Office is a national campaign, and the substantial resources which the Government have made available to launch and develop the campaign are not allocated for use in or in relation to any particular part of the country. The primary responsibility for tackling the problem of drug misuse at local level, including preventive education amd the provision of treatment and rehabilitation services for drug misusers, rests with local authorities and health boards, in consultation as appropriate with voluntary and community organisations.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the number of prosecutions for drug abuse involving cannabis, diamorphine and amphetamines for each police division in the Lothians and Borders police force for the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. John McKay: Information is available centrally only for the Lothian and Borders police force area as a whole. Figures for the years 1980 to 1984 are given in the table. Corresponding information for 1985 is not yet available.

Persons proceeded against for offences under drugs legislation or other offences involving controlled drugs in the Lothian and Borders police force area.*

	Number of persons
Type of drug	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984

Diamorphine (heroin)	10	42	72	59	77
Amphetamines	6	2	11	13	18

* As the same person may be proceeded against for offences involving more than one drug, rows cannot be added together to produce totals.

Gaelic Language

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if, pursuant to his answer to the right hon. Member for the Western Isles of 15 July concerning census forms, he will introduce legislation providing for the availability of forms in Gaelic.

Mr. Rifkind: For the 1981 census the Registrar General arranged that some Gaelic speaking enumerators would be employed in certain areas of Scotland. I understand that, as part of the planning process, he will consider the desirability of making similar arrangements for the 1991 census.

I have at present no plans for introducing legislation on this matter.

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if, pursuant to his answer to the right hon. Member for the Western Isles on 15 July regarding registration of births, marriages and deaths, he will introduce legislation to enable the use of Gaelic in the registration process.

Mr. Rifkind: I have at present no plans to do so.

Rural Areas (Financial Assistance)

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing Government expenditure on direct assistance to certain sectors of economic activity in rural Scotland for 1984-85 and 1985-86 on the same basis as the table published for 1983-84 in the report on economic trends and support to economic activity in rural Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The table published for 1983-84 was part of a special exercise for that year. No later information on a similar basis is currently available.

NHS (Management)

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the cost to public funds of the report commissioned by the Scottish Home and Health Department on "General Management in the Scottish Health Service: Application to Units" published in April.

Mr. John MacKay: The report was prepared after an eight-month period of research which included studies of existing unit management arrangements in four health boards—Argyll and Clyde, Grampian, Lanarkshire and Lothian. The total cost of this research, the production of detailed working papers, some additional work commissioned in connection with the research and the printing of the final report was £118,126, including expenses and value added tax.

Dounreay

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Scotland, further to his reply of 15 July, whether he will give a detailed breakdown of the estimated £5,000 cost to the inquiry reporters' unit of holding a one-day session in Lerwick of the public inquiry into the proposed reprocessing plant at Dounreay.

Mr. Rifkind: It has been calculated that the costs of holding the Dounreay public inquiry amount to £1,581 per day. This sum covers such items as salaries and fees, travel and subsistance, hire of inquiry premises, telephone installation and charges, the provision of a daily transcript of the proceedings and the installation and provision of photocopying facilities.

If the inquiry team of four were to move to Lerwick for a one-day session, they would have to devote two additional days to travel. The total cost would therefore be three times the daily rate quoted above, plus the travel cots of £440.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if the Nature Conservancy Council has submitted written evidence to the public inquiry considering the expansion of facilities at Dounreay; and if he will instruct the Nature Conservancy Council to appear before the inquiry.

Mr. Rifkind: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

State Hospital, Carstairs

Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan may expect a reply to his letter of 23 May regarding entrapped patients in the State hospital, Carstairs.

Mr. Rifkind: I have sent the right hon. Member a reply today.

Housing Action Areas

Mr. Fletcher asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about housing action areas in Scotland.

Mr. Rifkind: In recent months the consideration that I give to draft resolutions declaring housing action areas under the Housing (Scotland) Act 1974 has taken longer than normal.

I have been concered that some local authorities, principally the district councils of Glasgow and Edinburgh, have continued to declare new housing action areas although there are substantial existing demands on their non-housing revenue account allocations and they have no basis for assuming that they could meet new demands in addition for some considerable time. The delay in coming to decisions on individual current draft housing action area resolutions has been caused, in part, by difficulty in obtaining and assessing the costs of proceeding with the development of these areas and in establishing the priority which the local authorities concerned give to each housing action area in relation to other housing action areas in their council's area and to the other demands on the non-HRA block.

I have therefore decided that from today all draft housing action area resolutions submitted to me for consideration should be accompanied by additional information to enable these assessments to be made. A circular letter explaining in detail these proposals will be issued shortly by the Scottish Development Department. I have also agreed today that all the draft resolutions currently with my Department should be cleared.

I hope that these new arrangements will provide local authorities with a framework which will assist them in deciding priorities within the resources available to them on the non-HRA block.

National Health Service

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will set out (a) gross and (b) net of charges expenditure, current and capital, on the National Health Service and personal social services for each year from 1971 to 1986-87 for Scotland for (a) hospital and community health services, (b) family practitioner committees and their predecessors, (c) centrally funded National Health Service services, and (d) personal social services, with the percentage increase deflated by (i) gross domestic product, (ii) retail prices index and (iii) pay and prices.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

North British Hotel, Glasgow

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what grants or loans were made by the Scottish Development Agency in connection with the refurbishment of the North British Hotel, Glasgow, between 1983 and 1985; and what money was repaid when the hotel was subsequently sold.

Mr. Rifkind [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1986, c. 383]: Through the local enterprise grants for urban projects (LEGUP) scheme the Scottish Development Agency provided a loan of £200,000 in connection with the refurbishment of the North British hotel in October 1984. Under the terms of the loan this sum plus an early redemption payment of £31,438 was repaid to the agency in December 1985 after the hotel was sold.

A separate direct grant of £187,110 was paid under the agency's environmental powers for stone cleaning and other works. None of this was due to be repaid.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police Liaison Committees

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to which London boroughs have established official police liaison committees; at what estimated cost; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, who has responsibility for establishing consultative arrangements throughout the Metropolitan police district, that community/police consultative groups have been established in 35 of the 40 London boroughs. The cost involved in running these groups is met from the Metropolitan police fund and is estimated for the current financial year at £327,000.

The following boroughs have consultative groups:

Immigration

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is satisfied with the application and interpretation of the primary purpose rule by the immigration service.

Mr. Waddington: This rule and the other requirements for people seeking entry on the basis of marriage are necessary safeguards against the use of marriage to secure admission or settlement by those who would not otherwise qualify. Immigration staff apply the immigration rules approved by Parliament in the light of the decisions of the courts and the immigration appellate authorities.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons were detained under Immigration Act powers for a period of more than two months on completion of a custodial sentence during 1985.

Mr. Waddington: Twenty persons who completed a custodial sentence in 1985 were so detained under deportation powers. I regret that similar information relating to illegal entrants is not available.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will provide, for the latest convenient date, a table indicating the period of time spent in prison department establishments by persons detained under Immigration Act powers, showing numbers detained for not more than one, two, three, four, five, six and for six or more months, respectively.

Mr. Waddington: The information requested in respect of prison department establishments in England and Wales on 1 July 1986 is:

2 months	20
3 months	6
5 months	4

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide a table of the number of appeals to immigration adjudicators allowed, dismissed and withdrawn in the first quarter of 1986, broken down by category of appeal and nationality.

Mr. Waddington: The information requested is given in the table:

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were detained in prison department establishments during 1985 as (a) illegal entrants, (b) deportees, (c) seamen deserters and (d) passengers arriving at ports of entry.

Mr. Waddington: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will provide for the latest convenient date a table indicating the number of persons detained under Immigration Act powers by individual prison department establishment and category.

Mr. Waddington: The information requested in respect of prison department establishments in England and Wales on 1 July 1986 is:

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were detained in prison department establishments under Immigration Act powers during 1985 after completion of a custodial sentence; and what was the average length of such detention.

Mr. Waddington: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will provide for the latest convenient date a table indicating the number of persons detained under the Immigration Act powers by individual prison department establishment and category.

Mr. Waddington: The information requested in respect of prison department establishments in England and Wales on 1 July 1986 is:

Establishment	Persons subject to deportation procedures	Illegal entrants	Persons refused leave to enter the United Kingdom*
Birmingham	3	1	—
Blundeston	1	—	—

Neighbourhood Watch (Southampton)

asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the 15 wards in Southampton are covered by neighbourhood watch schemes; and what information he has as to the number of uniformed police involved, and as to the number of citizens on the organising committees.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the chief constable of Hampshire that there is one neighbourhood watch scheme in Southampton, which operates within the Bassett ward. The scheme was initiated by the current co-ordinator, a member of the public, who is assisted by other residents. Two uniformed beat officers also assist, in consultation with the local crime prevention officer and superintendent. The police have also received 16 inquiries about establishing neighbourhood watch schemes covering six wards from members of the public in Southampton and are to meet those interested.

Public House Signs (Travelling People)

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek to amend the law relating to signs which may be displayed in public houses to prevent discrimination against travelling people.

Mr. Waddington: Under the Race Relations Act 1976 it is unlawful to publish an advertisment or notice which indicates an intention to discriminate on grounds of colour, race, nationality or ethnic or national origins. We have no plans to extend these provisions to cover other forms of discrimination.

Rape

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases of rape were reported in the last three years; and what was the number of convictions for rape in this period.

Mr. Mellor: Annual numbers of offences of rape recorded by the police were published most recently in table 5 of Home Office statistical bulletin issue 4/86. Information on persons found guilty of rape is published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables" (table S4.1(A) of the issue for 1984) under offence classification 19; this information is not yet available for 1985. The figures for rape include some offences other than under section 1 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956, including offences of aiding and abetting and attempts.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many rape offences were reported to the police in 1985 and 1986; and how many have been cleared up.

Mr. Mellor: A total of 1,842 offences of rape were recorded by the police in England and Wales in 1985; 1,177 offences of rape were cleared up. These figures have been published in table 5 of Home Office statistical bulletin issue No. 4/86. A total of 465 offences of rape were recorded in the first quarter of 1986; figures for the second quarter are not yet available. Details of offences cleared up are collected centrally only annually and so no information is yet available for 1986.

Mr. Rashpal Singh

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the removal of Rashpal Singh, port reference number TN3/RLE/3846/86, on 29 June took place whilst representations were being made about his temporary admission as a sportsman.

Mr. Waddington: No. Representations had not been received by the time Mr. Rashpal Singh was removed. I will be writing to the constituency member about the circumstances in which removal took place.

Prisoners (Mental Illness)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners were considered by prison medical officers to be mentally ill within the criteria of the Mental Health Act on the most recent convenient date.

Mr. Mellor: On 31 March 1986 there were 305 prisoners in England and Wales who, in the opinion of the prison medical officer, were suffering from mental disorder of a nature or degree which would satisfy the criteria in the Mental Health Act 1983.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners considered by prison medical officers to be mentally ill within Mental Health Act criteria left penal establishments after serving sentences or following a remand in custody in the most recent convenient year.

Mr. Mellor: I regret that this information is not recorded centrally.

Penal Establishments

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which penal establishments are currently of security category C; and what is the average cost of keeping a prisoner and the staff-prisoner ratio at each.

Mr. Mellor: The most recent available information is as follows:

Establishment	Prisoners per member of staff (as at 1 January 1986)	Cost per prisoner (1984-85) £
Featherstone	3·71	188
Ranby	3·11	203

Figures are not available where the establishment was not operating or was not fully operational as a category C prison at the date given, except in the case of the Britannia unit of Norwich prison, the costs of which are not separately recorded centrally.

Public Houses (Assaults on Staff)

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average penalty imposed by the courts for assaults upon licensees or staff in each of the last five years.

Mr. Mellor: Except in the case of assault on a police officer the information collected centrally on court proceedings does not include details of the victim of the assault.

Terrorism

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons have been held under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act at Liverpool between 10 July and 14 July in each of the past three years.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The figures for detentions under the Prevention of Terrorism legislation at Liverpool between 10 and 14 July in 1984-86 are as follows:

Securicor

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what duties are performed by Securicor on behalf of the immigration service.

Mr. Waddington: Securicor Ltd. has been contracted to the Home Office since 1970 to provide staff who act as orderlies for passengers under examination by an immigration officer and for the purpose of guarding and escorting persons detained under the Immigration Act 1971.

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what payments have been made to Securicor in each year since 1978 for duties performed on behalf of the immigration service.

Mr. Waddington: The cost of the service provided by Securicor Ltd. is a matter of contract which it would not be appropriate for me to disclose.

Bingo

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek powers to enable bingo to be played on licensed premises.

Mr. Mellor: We have no plans to seek powers to enable bingo to be played on licensed premises in circumstances where it is not already permitted.

Drink-Driving

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to bring forward a zero limit drink-driving law.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I have been asked to reply.

I believe that at present we must continue to concentrate on increasing compliance with the law as it stands.

Illegal Immigrants

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of (a) persons against whom action was commenced as alleged illegal immigrants in 1984, 1985 and the first quarter of 1986, respectively, (b) persons who were detained as a result of such action in those years and (c) persons who were removed as illegal immigrants or, subsequent to commencement of action, deported voluntarily in those years; if he will identify such persons by country of origin; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington [pursuant to his reply, 11 July 1986, c. 285-6]: The information requested has now been collated and is set out below. It shows for each year, and for the first quarter of 1986,

(a) those against whom action was commenced as illegal entrants;

(b) those detained in custody as a result of such action; and

(c) those removed or departing voluntarily as illegal entrants

It should be noted that since action against those in (a) or (b) was not necessarily concluded during the relevant year, the figures at (c) do not necesarily correspond with those at (a) or (b).

The information is largely based on the type of passport held by the people concerned which will not in all cases indicate their country of origin. Some of the small number of British overseas citizens, stateless persons and persons of doubtful nationality may not have been included in these figures.

ENVIRONMENT

Induction Loop System

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with local authorities as to the introduction of an induction loop system for people hard of hearing in all council buildings; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: It is for local authorities to decide in which of their buildings induction loops should be provided but the Town and Country Planning Act 1971, as amended by the Disabled Persons Act 1981, requires the local planning authority, when granting planning permission for buildings to which the public are admitted, to draw the attention of the person to whom permission is granted to the British Standards Institution code of practice BS5810. This recommends the installation of induction loops in new conference halls and similar facilities.

Planning Appeals

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many planning appeals against decisions made by the borough of Brighton were considered for each of the years 1975 to 1985, inclusive; and what percentage were upheld each year.

Mr. Tracey: The number of planning appeals against decisions made by the Brighton borough council in the calendar years 1984 and 1985, the earliest period for which information is available, and the percentage upheld were:

Number of appeals decided		Percentage of appeals upheld
29	35	41	51

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many planning appeals were considered by his Department for each of the years between 1975 and 1985, inclusive; and what percentage were rejected in each year.

Mr. Tracey: The information requested is as follows:

	Number of appeals decided	Percentage of appeals rejected
1975	11,486	74·6
1976	9,253	70·6
1977	8,366	70·8
1978	8,952	72·0
1979	8,933	70·9
1980	13,130	69·2
1981	14,451	67·3
1982	12,915	69·0
1983	11,221	67·6
1984	11,643	67·6
1985	14,639	62·6

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the numbers and different categories of planning appeals against decisions made by the borough of Brighton for each of the years 1975 to 1985, inclusive; and what percentage in each category were upheld.

Mr. Tracey: The numbers and different categories of planning appeals against decisions made by the Brighton borough council in the calendar years 1984 and 1985, the earliest period for which information is available, were:

Development type	Number decided in 1984	Number upheld in 1984	Number decided in 1985	Number upheld in 1985
Other major developments	1	0	1	1
Minor dwellings	4	2	7	4
Minor offices	4	1	1	0
Minor retail	2	2	2	1

Midlands (Enterprise Zones)

Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which areas in the midlands are designated as enterprise zones; and what financial assistance is available by way of buildings, machinery or training grants for personnel of companies seeking to locate in an enterprise zone.

Sir George Young: The following areas in the midlands have been designated as enterprise zones:

Name of zone	Area of zone (hectares)
Corby	113
Dudley	263
Telford	113
Wellingborough	54

Three financial benefits are available to firms in enterprise zones, for a 10-year period from the date on which each zone is designated:

i. industrial and commercial property is exempt from rates;

ii. One hundred per cent. of capital expenditure on the construction of industrial and commercial buildings can be set against tax. This allowance is available either for corporation or income tax purposes; and

iii. the power of industrial training boards to impose a levy on employers does not apply to establishments in enterprise zones.

Households (Statistics)

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what information he has as to the number of households renting accommodation from a local authority in each parliamentary constituency in Greater London at the time of the 1981 and 1971 censuses and as to the percentage of all households that figure represents;

(2) what information he has as to the number of households living in owner-occupied accommodation in each parliamentary constituency in Greater London at the time of the 1981 and 1971 censuses and as to the percentage this figure represents of the total households.

Sir George Young: The information available is contained in "Census 1971, Parliamentary Constituency Tables as constituted at February 1974 (England, Scotland, Wales)" and, for the same constituencies, in "Census 1981 Parliamentary Constituency Monitors, Great Britain". Both were published by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys and are available in the Library.

Dover House Drive, Wellsbourne (Planning Appeal)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to announce the date for the public inquiry in respect of planning appeal No. APP/J3720.A.86, regarding Dover house drive, Wellsbourne following the submission of appeal forms by the appellant company on 2 April.

Mr. Tracey: The inquiry will open at 10 am on Wednesday 24 September 1986 in the Committee Room, Council Offices, Church street, Stratford-upon-Avon.

Crown Suppliers

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about consultations with the Property Services Agency departmental trade union side before he takes a decision on the Crown Suppliers review team reports, 1 and 2, and on the further considerations and report made to him by the central purchasing unit.

Sir George Young: The departmental trade union side continues to be fully consulted before any final decisions are taken about the future of the Crown suppliers.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place a copy of the report of the central purchasing unit on the future of the Crown Suppliers in the Library; and if he will make a copy available to the Property Services Agency departmental trade union side.

Sir George Young: The advice from the central unit on purchasing to Ministers is not in a form suitable for publication. However, I hope soon to be in a position to indicate the next steps I propose to take in the light of the CUP advice and the earlier review team report.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a detailed statement containing a full cost-benefit analysis of the advantages and disadvantages of contracting out, hiving off or privatisation of any part ot the Crown Suppliers.

Sir George Young: I am not yet in a position to make a detailed statement on those lines.

Charitable Housing Associations

Mr. Ground asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the number of dwellings in England and Wales, at present owned by charitable housing associations, which were built by local authorities prior to 1974 and which are not covered by the legislation granting to tenants the right to buy or cash payments to assist with home purchases.

Sir George Young: I regret that neither the Department nor the Housing Corporation holds centrally any information on which to make such an estimate.

Local Authority Enterprise Boards

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will unfreeze applications made to his Department by local authority enterprise boards for grants from the European regional development fund; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: I am considering the most appropriate means of dealing with applications from such bodies for grants from the European regional development fund in the light of my current review of the local authority capital control system.

Acid Rain

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what studies are being undertaken by his Department on the effects of sulphur dioxide emissions from sources in the United Kingdom on (a) European lakes and forests generally and (b) Norwegian lakes and forests.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department is carrying out a wide range of studies, including both field and laboratory work, on such matters as the status of freshwater catchments and the effects of acidity on lakes, streams, soils, trees and crops. None of these studies specifically relates to lakes and forests in parts of Europe other than the United Kingdom, but the results are likely to be applicable to conditions in other countries. We are also involved in wider international research through bilateral exchanges of research information and participation in collaborative work within the European Community and the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether Her Majesty's Government are considering the payment of compensation to Norway for any damage done by emission of sulphur dioxide from sources in the United Kingdom to Norwegian lakes and forests.

Mr. Waldegrave: No.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations have been made by the Norwegian Government to Her Majesty's Government seeking compensation for damage done to Norwegian lakes and forests by emissions of sulphur dioxide from sources in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Waldegrave: None.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the effect which emissions of sulphur dioxide from sources in the United Kingdom have had on (a) Norwegian forests and lakes and (b) European forests and lakes, generally.

Mr. Waldegrave: There is a wide consensus among the scientists involved that sulphur dioxide emissions, from United Kingdom and other European sources, are involved in the acidification of lakes in certain sensitive areas of Europe, notably in Norway and Sweden. However, other factors, including certain forestry and agricultural practices, also appear to play a part and it is difficult, given our present limited understanding of the damage mechanisms involved, to quantify the effects of one country's emissions on the ecosystems of another country.

The cause of the damage which has been found in forests in central Europe is still unclear. Although air pollution is generally agreed to be a contributory factor, emissions of sulphur dioxide from United Kingdom sources are unlikely to be a significant source of the problem. So far as I am aware, no damage to forests of the kind found in central Europe is evident in Norway.

Norfolk Broads

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to introduce legislation relating to the Norfolk Broads; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State to the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Ryder) on 7 March in column 288. It remains our firm intention to introduce a Bill to set up a new statutory authority for the Broads area at the earliest practicable opportunity.

UK2000

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what salary will be paid to members of the board of UK2000; how many hours a week they will be expected to spend on board business; and what expenses they will be able to claim.

Mrs. Rumbold: Members are not paid for serving on the UK2000 board; they can claim travelling and subsistence expenses. The time spent on board business is likely to be different for each member, and to alter as circumstances change.

Water Authorities (Debt Burden)

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals his Department is considering for the restructuring of the debt burden of the water authorities.

Mr. John Patten: Nearer the time of privatisation, the Government will discuss with each authority the appropriate restructuring of its balance sheet on conversion to plc status.

Lead Fishing Weights

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with the Lead Development Association in connection with its proposal to purchase redundant lead weights from fishing clubs following the publication of regulations to ban the use of these weights from January 1987; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: My Department has been closely involved in discussions with the Lead Development Association throughout the preparation of the scheme. I have welcomed the scheme's introduction and commended it to all anglers and angling clubs.

Rating Reform

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will take steps to extend the availability of information about the Government's proposals for the reform of the rating system.

Mr. Waldegrave: Apart from the Green Paper itself, we have produced a factual pamphlet summarising the main proposals. In addition, we have prepared a short audio visual presentation which may be borrowed on application to room N6/16 at the Department.

Hazardous Waste Inspectorate (Report)

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will publish the second report of the hazardous waste inspectorate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: On behalf of myself and the Secretaries of State for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, I am pleased to welcome the second report of the Hazardous Waste Inspectorate published today. Copies have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. The report is concerned with the standards achieved in the disposal of hazardous wastes for the year ending 31 March 1986. Whilst in general terms the report reiterates the critical message of the inspectorate's 1985 report, repeating and further detailing the observations of widely differing standards of disposal site licensing, operation and inspection across the country, it also notes some encouraging improvements.

The report extends the inspectorate's observations of disparate operational and control standards to sites operated by waste producers, and comments favourably on standards of waste management in the very small number of Crown establishments which have been visited by the inspectorate.

In noting improvements which have occurred, the report draws attention both to operational improvements at some of the worst sites upon which the inspectorate previously reported, and to the encouraging moves by some waste disposal authorities in the deployment of additional resources to this important aspect of their duties.

The report details specific incidents where the technical guidance on best practice issued by my Department's series of waste management papers has been disregarded without, apparently, breaching disposal site licence conditions and calls, therefore, for clearer definition of the best practicable environmental option for the disposal of certain waste streams, together with the revision of site licensing guidance provided by my Department, disposal site licence conditions and calls, therefore, for clearer definition of the best practicable environmental option for the disposal of certain waste streams, together with the revision of site licensing guidance provided by my Department. Drawing upon those examples and upon its preliminary review of disposal site licence conditions for a number of major landfill disposal sites, the Hazardous Waste Inspectorate also advocates improved standards of landfill site licensing. In particular, it calls for clearer definition of the types and quantitties of wastes acceptable at landfill sites, for improved monitoring and for more care to be taken in ensuring that the conditions imposed upon licences or local authority resolutions are enforceable.

The Government welcome the signs of improvement recorded by the inspectorate as an indication of what can be achieved within the existing statute. However, higher standards must be consistently achieved across the country in future and the Government announced their intention to introduce tougher waste management controls on 10 December 1985. These proposals are in an advanced stage of preparation before being put out to consultation. I am convinced that these, together with the revision of guidance on disposal site licensing, will further secure the improvements which are needed in standards of waste management.

Urban Housing Renewal Unit

Mr. Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the latest progress made by his urban housing renewal unit.

Sir George Young: I am pleased to announce my right hon. Friend's favourable response to proposals for a further seven schemes submitted to the urban housing renewal unit. These schemes are in the London borough of Brent, the royal borough of Kensington and Chelsea, Cannock Chase district council, City of Wakefield metropolitan district council. Langbaurgh borough council and Knowsley metropolitan borough council. All these schemes, which have been worked up by the local authorities in close collaboration with the Department's urban housing renewal unit and regional offices, involve improved housing management.

Approval in principle has been given for additional resources to be made available in 1986-87. The amounts and the estates which will benefit are as follows:

Authority	Estate (dwellings)	Targeted UHRU HIP resources £	Targeted UHRU UP resources £	Description
Brent	Chalkhill (141)	900,000		Pilot scheme to remodel blocks of flats to control access and create smaller, identifiable management units; security measures and provision of concierge system.
Brent	South Kilburn (640)	550,000		Extension of existing concierge pilot scheme to 5 other tower blocks—involving security measures and delegation of management functions to individual blocks.
Kensington and Chelsea	Holmefield House (189)	160,000		Remodelling of estate to control access and increase security, opening of local housing office on estate; provision of resident estate supervisor.
Cannock Chase	Rawnsley (160)	307,000		Security and environmental improvements to estate; external works to dwellings and heating and insulation improvements; appointment of full-time estate officer and more localised delivery of housing services.
Wakefield	Simpson's Lane (120)	300,000		Security measures and improvements to environment and external appearance of dwellings; appointment of two resident caretakers.
Langbaurgh	Redcar Road East, South Bank (876)	20,000		Environmental works to derelict land sites; estate office to be set up providing full range of housing services backed by estate-based repairs team, with advice from Priority Estates Project consultant.
Knowsley	Tower Hill (1,921)		396,000	Environmental improvements; provision of estate housing office; remodelling of layout access and environment of estate.

Pleasure Boats (Litter)

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to increase control on litter being deposited from pleasure boats in rivers flowing through metropolitan areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: Such littering is an offence against the Litter Act 1983 and can attract a fine of up to £400; we have no plans to change the law.

Enterprise Boards

Sir Russell Johnston asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he intends to publish the review he has been carrying out into the status of enterprise boards.

Mr. Tracey: We are not currently carrying out a review of the status of enterprise boards. We shall consider the most appropriate means of dealing with applications from such bodies for grants from the European regional development fund in the light of the Department's current review of the local authority capital control system.

Sir Russell Johnston asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how he intends to deal with peripheral bodies and local authority companies in the course of his current review of enterprise boards' job-creating programmes.

Mr. Tracey: I am not aware of any review of enterprise boards' job-creating programmes.

Transferable Discounts

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is his estimate of the annual cost to public funds of offering transferable discounts to tenants of wheelchair housing owned by local authorities or housing associations on the same basis as to able-bodied tenants of housing associations;

(2) how many tenants of housing associations have applied for a transferable discount; and if he will express this figure as a percentage of the total number of housing units owned by housing associations whose tenants are eligible for transferable discounts.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his replies, 3 June 1986, c. 504-505]: In addition to the 7,573 tenants who had applied for a transferable discount under the home ownership scheme for tenants of charitable housing associations up to 31 March 1986, I now understand that there are an estimated 680 further tenants who had registered an initial interest but who have not yet sought approval in principle for their discounts. These 8,223 applications in fact represent just over 10 per cent. of the estimated total number of dwellings owned by charitable housing associations whose tenants are eligible for the scheme.

Homeless Households

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what was the number of homeless households placed by (i) local authorities in greater London and (ii) local authorities in the non-metropolitan areas in bed and breakfast accommodation (a) at the end of 1984 and (b) at end of 1985;

(2) what is his Department's explanation of the increase in the number of homeless households placed by (i) local authorities in the greater London and (ii) local authorities in non-metropolitan areas in bed and breakfast accommodation at the end of 1985 over that at the end of 1984;

(3) what is his Department's explanation of the higher percentage increase in the number of homeless households placed by (i) local authorities in the non-metropolitan areas, compared with (ii) local authorities in greater London in bed and breakfast accommodation at the end of 1985 over the number of households placed in bed and breakfast accommodation at the end of 1984.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his reply, 18 July 1986]: The relevant information on numbers of homeless households is as follows:

	31 December 1984	31 December 1985	number	percentage	1984	1985	number	percentage
Non Metropolitan areas	750	1,100	350	47	35,820	41,890	6,070	17

The number of households in bed and breakfast accommodation reflects the availability of alternative accommodation locally and the level of acceptances by individual local authorities. An additional factor is the volume of applications and the extent to which authorities place households in bed and breakfast pending the completion of inquiries into their circumstances.

Though proportionately the increase in households in bed and breakfast accommodation in the non-metropolitan areas has recently been larger than in Greater London, it has been smaller in absolute terms and smaller in relation to the number of acceptances.

Homelessness

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his statement on 20 December 1985, Official Report, column 709, if he intends to announce further measures to help relieve the growing problem of homelessness.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his reply, 18 July 1986]: We are constantly looking at ways to prevent and relieve homelessness. Some measures have already been announced and others will follow as and when they are ready.

Homes Insulation

Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the outturn figures for spending by St. Helens district council under the homes insulation scheme in 1984-85 and 1985-86.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his reply, 18 July 1986]: St. Helens district council's expenditure on homes insulation grants in 1984-85, for which it has received 100 per cent. Exchequer funding, was £53,642. The corresponding final figure for 1985-86 is not available.

Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 14 July concerning grants available to local authorities under the homes insulation scheme, what criteria he used in reaching the level of funding available to St. Helens district council for 1984-85 and 1985–86; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his reply, 18 July 1986]: Each year the Department asks local authorities to submit bids for homes insulation scheme resources for the forthcoming financial year. All the bids are considered together against expected demand for grants, and the resources available. In 1984-85 St. Helens district council bid for £80,000 and was allocated £75,000.

In 1985-86 St. Helens district council bid for £100,000 and was allocated an initial £72,000. It was allocated an additional £30,000 in November 1975 on the basis of information it provided about its grant commitment to date.

Development Corporations

Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he has had any discussions with the local authorities about the possiblity of development corporations being appointed in some areas to take over certain local government functions; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he has any plans to introduce a development corporation into the metropolitan district of St. Helens; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his reply, 18 July 1986]: The possibility of building on the achievements of existing urban development corporations is being considered by my right hon. Friend, and it has been raised at various meetings with representatives of local authorities and others. No decisions have been taken on further designations, whether in St. Helens or elsewhere.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Lower Attaining Pupils Programme

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many children are currently involved in the lower attaining pupils programme; what is the total cost of the programme to both central and local Government; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: Some 5,500 pupils participated in the lower attaining pupils' programme in the academic year 1984-85 and about 11,000 in 1985-86.

The programme provides for total expenditure of about £3 million a year to be supported through the urban programme. The local education authorities involved bear 25 per cent. of the cost of their projects. Seventy five per cent. is borne by central Government, supplemented in the case of two projects by funds of the European Community transition to work programme. The Government strongly support the lower attaining pupils' programme, which aims to provide a more effective education for those pupils, mostly aged 14-16, who were deriving little benefit from school. An open day was held recently at Warwick university to disseminate the interim findings of the programme to a wide range of educational interests. I enclose a copy of the speech made by my right hon. Friend on that occasion.

Pupil Statistics

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give the total number of children in independent, grammar and non-grammar public sector schools, for pre-compulsory and for post-compulsory schooling, expressed in both numerical terms and as a proportion of the relevant age cohort.

Mr. Dunn: The total numbers of full-time and part-time pupils in independent, grammar and other maintained schools for pre and post-compulsory schooling in England in January 1986 are given below:

January 1986 (provisional)

	Pre-compulsory age pupils ie under five years*		Post-compulsory age pupils ie 16+*
	Number	Per cent.†	Number	Per cent.‡
Independent schools	32,820	3	66,634	3
Grammar schools	—	—	24,623	1
Other maintained schools	508,856	43	280,034	13

* Age as at end August 1985.

† The age cohort for under fives is the OPCS estimate of the three and four-year-old population in England.

‡ The age cohort for 16+ pupils is the OPCS estimate of the population aged 16-18 years in England.

Student Support (Questionnaire)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science which countries outside the Eurodice network are being asked to answer the questionnaire on student support issued by his Department as part of the review of student support; and whether he is satisfied that the questionnaire is comprehensive for the purposes of making meaningful international comparisons.

Mr. Walden: The questionnaire referred to was issued before the review of student support was announced, and was concerned only with the level of social security benefits and indirect support to students in countries covered by Eurodice. The information it yields will clearly have to be brought together with up-to-date information on support via grants and loans before meaningful international comparisons can be attempted.

Students (Dependants' Allowances)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many students receive allowances for dependants during term time; and what is the cost of these allowances to public funds.

Mr. Walden: In the academic year 1984-85 nearly 7,350 students received allowances for dependants under regulations made by the Secretary of State, most of them for a full year of 52 weeks. The total cost was aout £9·5 million; the cost of allowances paid during term-time cannot be separately distinguished.

Part-time Education (Development Funding)

Dr. Hampson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he is prepared to review the development funding of part-time education in the light of the University Grants Committee's decisions with regard to Birkbeck College.

Mr. Walden: I am not aware that the discussions between London university and the University Grants Committee regarding Birkbeck College raise any broader issues about the funding of developments in part-time higher education. We welcome the recent increases in part-time student numbers and hope they continue.

Clinical Academic Staff

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) whether clinical academic staff will receive the same pay increase, implemented from the same date, as their National Health Service colleagues;

(2) why there has been a delay in providing the funding for the 1986 pay increase for clinical academic staff.

Mr. Ryman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will make it the policy of Her Majesty's Government that sufficient funds are made available to universities to enable clinical academic staff to receive future pay awards on the same date as their counterparts in the National Health Service; when he expects that funds will be made available to implement the 1986 pay award to clinical academic staff; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if, in the light of Her Majesty's Government's commitment to link clinical academic staff pay to that of equivalent National Health Service staff, he will explain the factors which governed the decision to pay National Health Service doctors their 1986 increase with their July pay before the timing of the payment of the 1986 increase to clinical academic staff had been determined; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: The Government have said that they accept the principle that the pay of clinical academic staff should be linked to that of doctors and dentists in the National Health Service. But the pay levels of clinical academic staff are actually determined by the clinical academic staffs salaries committee in which the Government have no part. The Government have undertaken that, if a pay settlement is agreed in CASSC which provides increases for clinical academic staff equivalent to those in the National Health Service arising from the Doctors and Dentists Review Body report, it will provide the universities with additional funds to cover the cost of that settlement to the extent that it exceeds the pay settlement for non-clinical academic staff. The sum involved cannot be determined until the two pay settlements have been agreed.

Psoriasis

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much has been spent on research into psoriasis by the Medical Research Council in each of the past three years.

Mr. Walden: I understand from the Medical Research Council that expenditure on projects exclusively on research in psoriasis has been as follows:

Financial Year	£'000
1983-84	199
1984-85	271

Teachers

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the names of the local education authorities which have applied for teachers from ethnic minorities to be granted qualified teacher status together with the number applied for in each case.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information is not available. Local education authorities recommending teachers for qualified teacher status are not required to specify the ethnic origin of those teachers.

Information Technology

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will publish a breakdown of figures for spending on information technology related courses, separating computer science from mathematics, in universities, polytechnics and other institutions for the most recent years available;

(2) if he will publish figures on university spending on information technology-related courses in the most recent years available, separating computer science from mathematics.

Mr. Walden: Details of expenditure on courses in universities and the public sector of higher education are not available centrally on the basis sought by my hon. Friend.

The Government have made additional funds available through the information technology and engineering and technology programme, to expand the provision of places on information technology-related courses; these will supplement the considerable teaching and research activity already taking place in both sectors of higher education.

Spina Bifida

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list those centres which are currently involved in the Medical Research Council tests involving vitamin supplementation of mothers at risk of having spina bifida children.

Mr. Walden: I understand that the following centres are participating in the Medical Research Council's randomised clinical trial of folic acid and other vitamin supplementation in the prevention of neural tube defects.

It would not be possible to quantify the number of staff involved without a disproportionate effort. So far the Department has managed to contain these new demands within the manpower ceilings.

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the number of full-time equivalent employees in (a) administrative and (b) other grades in his Department in each year since 1970.

Mr. Chris Patten: The full-time equivalent staff-in-post figures for the Department of Education and Science including the UGC are as follows:

O-level Pass Rate

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the O-level pass rate expressed as a percentage of the total school population in England and Wales at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Dunn: Information is not available precisely in the form requested. However, the Department's school leavers sample survey estimates that 65 per cent. of the GCE O-level examinations, as taken by pupils of all ages who left school during the academic year 1984-85, were awarded at higher grades A-C. It is also estimated that 82 per cent. were awarded at grades A-E.

Information for Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Appeals

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will list in the Official Report the number of appeals received by him in the last year under (i) section 5(6) and (ii) section 8(6) of the Education Act 1981; and whether he will provide a breakdown of the decisions made in respect of those appeals and state the number on which a decision is outstanding and the average time for a decision to be made.

Mr. Dunn: The information is as follows:

Further Education

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the level of participation in further education of young people with special educational needs as compared with the general levels of participation.

Mr. Walden: The information is not centrally available. However, some figures relevant to the question will be available later this year, following the completion of a survey commissioned by the Department.

School Closures

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will list in the Official Report the number of school closures awaiting his decision under section 12 of the Education Act 1980; and whether he will provide a breakdown of the decisions made in terms of those confirmed and overruled.

Mr. Dunn: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Teachers and Lecturers (Pay)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give the maximum and minimum salaries of (a) a senior teacher in a school and (b) a lecturer on the career scale lecturer II/senior lecturer in a polytechnic at (i) 1 April 1979, (ii) 1 September 1980, following the comparability study under the chairmanship of Professor Clegg and (iii) 1 April 1986, all expressed in terms of 1 April 1986, as corrected by the index of average earnings; and the decrease in comparable terms between 1 September 1980 and 1 April 1986 following the recent interim award.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 18 July 1986]: The information is presented below. Columns 1 and 2 of the table give salary figures at cash prices. Columns 3 and 4 present these salary figures in index form, adjusted by the index of average earnings.

TRANSPORT

A1-M1 Link Road

Mr. William Powell asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has yet received the report of the inspector who conducted the inquiry into the proposed A1-M1 link road.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for the Environment and for Transport have just received the report and will be studying it carefully.

M63 (Barton Bridge)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report what publicity he has given to the M63-Barton bridge motorway works and to the alternative routes indicating at which areas such publicity has been aimed.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In November we met representatives of the national motoring organisations, public transport operators, road hauliers, local industry and the local emergency services to discuss alternative routes for all types of traffic to avoid the Barton bridge area. My own visit to the region in March included a press conference and TV interviews about it. A 24-hour telephone answering service was established and a site liaison officer is available to answer queries. Over a million pamphlets illustrating recommended alternative routes were released to the public via travel agents, local authorities, police stations, motorway service areas, public libraries and the motoring organisations. A regular Barton bridge bulletin is published for use by the media and gives the latest information on the traffic situation.

The publicity campaign has been aimed at both local and longer distance traffic. I am grateful for the ready assistance we have received from the press, from BBC and independent radio and television, from motorway and industrial organisations and from Manchester international airport.

Property Acquisitions

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many (a) commercial and (b) residential properties have been acquired by his Department as a consequence of the national trunk road programme since 1979; and what is the estimated total cost of these acquisitions at 1986 prices.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This question can only be answered at disproportionate cost. I will write to the hon. Member.

Helicopters (Search and Rescue)

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to increase the use of civilian helicopters for search and rescue in addition to or in substitution of the provision made for search and rescue by the Ministry of Defence.

Mr. Michael Spicer: My Department has no plans to increase the use of civilian helicopters for search and rescue beyond the single contract S61N aircraft presently operated by Her Majesty's Coastguard from Sumburgh, Shetland Isles.

However, a working group set up by the United Kingdom search and rescue committee is reviewing the rescue helicopter coverage of the United Kingdom search and rescue region for civil maritime and aviation search and rescue and will make recommendations to the committee at its meeting in December.

Interested bodies and Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn, will be invited to make representations to the working group either by letter or at the group's coastal meetings in Inverness on 29 July and at Lee-on-Solent on 31 July.

M3 (Bar End-Chichester)

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is now in a position to announce his determination of the inspector's report into the completion of the M3 motorway from Bar End to Chichester in Hampshire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The inspector's report following the public inquiry into proposals for extending the M3 from Bar End near Winchester to the M27 was received last month. Although it will take some time to consider all the issues discussed at the inquiry, we will do so as quickly as possible. I hope to be able to announce decisions by the end of the year.

Level Crossings

Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will review the installation of automatic open level crossings in the light of recent accidents; and if he will make a statement on the safety of these crossings compared with conventional gated crossings.

Mr. David Mitchell: Preliminary reports indicate that in all the recent accidents at automatic open crossings the equipment was in full working order and each accident was caused by a failure of the road user to observe the simple rules for the safe use of the crossing. I have no plans therefore to review the arrangements for the installation of these crossings. Stopping at red traffic lights at a junction with another road or with rail is an elementary part of driver safety.

On the basis of comparison used in previous answers, it is still true to say that the likelihood of having an accident at a crossing with gates is some one and a third times greater than at an automatic open crossing of the type where the train driver monitors the correct functioning of the crossing such as is installed at Woodham Ferrers.

Aviation Fuel Prices

Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the implications of the extent to which lower aviation fuel prices have been passed on to the consumer by airlines for his policy on competition in the airline business; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The regulation of air fares is primarily for the Civil Aviation Authority. The authority looks at all of a United Kingdom airline's costs, including its fuel costs, when exercising its regulatory functions. Through our competition policy, it is for each airline to take the initiative in deciding whether to pass to the consumer any benefits it may receive from cheaper fuel; but fuel is only one factor in aviation costs which must be taken into account. Airlines also have to consider changes in other operating costs and levels of traffic and revenue.

Passenger Coaches (Roof Strength)

Mr. Lilley asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will report progress in implementing the international standard for coach roof strength on passenger coaches.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The UN:ECE regulation on coach roof strength is expected to be published soon. We are consulting interested organisations with a view to applying the standard to new coaches registered in Britian and introducing other new safety measures, including the provision of seat belts on front seats and the use of fire retardant materials.

Copies of the consultation letter have been placed in the Library of the House.

Management Consultants (Departmental Contracts)

Mr. Mates asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the contracts, with the subject of the assignment, awarded to management consultancy or accounting firms by his Department in 1985, with the name of the consultants concerned.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I regret full information in the form requested could be made available only at disproportionate cost. I will write to my hon. Friend.

British Rail

Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what discussions his Department has had with British Rail concerning reorganisation and the retention of jobs in areas of high unemployment;

(2) if he will make a statement on the proposed reorganisation of British Railways Board proposals for reorganisation of the traction maintenance division of British Rail.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State for Transport made a statement to the House on 20 May, at columns 188-89, about British Rail's proposals for rolling stock maintenance, including the measures being taken by the board to help those affected by the changes.

British Airways (Employees)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the number of employees employed by British Airways on 1 January for each year since 1979; and what proportion of these employees have been employed for less than a year.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The available figures are as follows:

British Airways Group Staff

	Number
31 March 1979	60,788
1 January 1980	60,646
1 January 1981	55,960
1 January 1982	49,685
1 January 1983	44,134
1 January 1984	36,567
1 January 1985	37,895
1 January 1986	39,723

At 1 January 1986, 3,586 staff (including 549 temporary staff) had less than one year's service.

Civil Aviation

Mr. Bill Walker asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is yet in a position to respond to the Civil Aviation Authority's recommendations on traffic distribution for the London area, contained in CAP 522; and what assessment he has made of the effects on air services between Dundee, Carlisle and Heathrow.

Mr. Neale asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has reached any decisions on the Civil Aviation Authority's advice on air traffic distribution in the London area (CAP 522).

Mr. Pollock asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is yet in a position to respond to the Civil Aviation Authority's advice on traffic distribution rules for the London airports contained in CAP 522.

Mr. Michael Spicer: My right hon. Friend has today written to Mr. Christopher Tugendhat, chairman of the CAA, responding to the authority's advice and indicating those traffic distribution rules which we propose to make as soon as section 31 of the Airports Act 1986 comes into force. I have placed copies of the letter in the Library.

Structural Highway Maintenance (Report)

Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has considered the report by Mr. J. A. Gaffney and his colleagues on their review of structural highway maintenance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We have now completed our preliminary consideration of this report on the structural maintenance of motorways and other trunk roads. We shall want to discuss its detailed conclusions with representatives of local authorities through the standing committee on highway maintenance. In the meantime, I am placing in the Library a copy of a document which indicates our broad response to the key recommendations of the report.

We welcome the report's general endorsement of the scale of investment which we have committed to the maintenance of motorways and trunk roads. There is a good prospect on present trends that we shall have dealt with the backlog of maintenance needs by 1992, as well as having kept pace with current deterioration. The report rightly emphasises the importance of early action to repair carriageways if uneconomic costs are to be avoided. We agree that we should seek, so far as practicable, to build a greater element of firmness and continuity into the major programmes of capital investment necessary for the satisfactory maintenance of the trunk road system. We acknowledge the need to take steps to refine and improve monitoring on the general lines recommended, and to develop further our procedures and techniques for ranking priorities.

We also recognise the basic importance of further development of the whole life costing approach in maintaining trunk roads, and of sponsoring the research and development work essential to updating knowledge and techniques for pavement design and maintenance. We regard the report, taken, as a whole, as a significant contribution to enabling us, together with our agent authorities, to ensure the satisfactory maintenance of the trunk road system.

NATIONAL FINANCE

EC (Resources)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will raise at the next meeting of the Council of Finance Ministers the paper 7113/86 issued by the Vice-President of the Commission regarding the exhaustion of European Economic Community resources in 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The Commission's paper 7113/86 containing its proposals for a supplementary budget for 1986 was subsumed in the Commission's letter of amendment to the 1986 budget, issued to the budget authority on 3 July. This and other matters concerning the adoption of the 1986 budget were discussed by ECOFIN and subsequently by Budget Council at their meetings on 7 July.

Customs Officers

Mr. Hancock asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will express as a ratio of the average number of passengers passing through each of the English ferry ports to Europe the numbers of Customs and Excise officers at such ports.

Mr. Brooke: The numbers of preventive staff at ports and airports are based on management assessment of risk. For operational reasons it is not in the public interest to disclose staffing resources at individual ports. Provisional figures for the year ended 31 March 1986 indicate that nationally there were about 90 inward passengers daily to each preventive officer at seaports.

Tax Inspectors (Wales)

Mr. Wigley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many inspectors of taxes are based in Wales; and how many of these are Welsh-speaking.

Mr. Norman Lamont: There are 319 inspectors of taxes based in Wales, of whom 25 are Welsh speaking. One hundred and one of these inspectors are spread among three large offices. Two of these offices deal with the affairs of taxpayers in the United Kingdom generally — civil servants and seamen, respectively, and the third is concerned solely with employees of non-Welsh employers.

Portsmouth Ferryport

Mr. Hancock asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will increase the numbers of customs officers working at Portsmouth ferryport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: Customs are constantly monitoring their staffing requirements and seeking to achieve greater efficiency in line with Government policy and as recently as January last the Portsmouth complement was increased by nearly 25 per cent.

The need for any additional resources for Customs is currently being considered by Ministers as part of the public expenditure survey.

Financial Management Unit

Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the functions of the financial management unit; and what work is being carried out on policy evaluation within the Civil Service.

Mr. Brooke: The financial management unit completed its work at the end of 1984. However, the joint management unit was established in early 1985 to assist the top management of the Treasury and Cabinet Office to provide effective leadership in carrying through the programme of management reform in the Civil Service designed to secure better value for money, see Official Report, 12 December 1984, column 493.

Policy evaluation is the responsibility of Departments concerned with individual policies. In addition, as was announced when the final reports of the financial management unit were made publicly available, the Government share the approach described in the report on policy work and the financial management initiative, and the joint management unit is working with Department on a programme of improvements, see Official Report, 10 June 1985, column 298.

EC Budget

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) pursuant to the statement on 11 July, Official Report, columns 613-21, what is his estimate of the United Kingdom net contribution to the European Economic Community in respect of 1986 before and after the agreement on the revised 1986 budget on 10 July; and if he will explain the precise reasons why the estimated net contribution in respect of 1986 will be lower in consequence of the revised budget;

(2) what estimate he has made of the amount of the additional expenditure on the structural funds which will accrue to the United Kingdom following the agreement on the revised European Economic Community budget for 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: No forecast of our net contribution to this year's Community budget has so far been made, though one will be included in the White Paper on the 1986

Community budget to be published in August or September. The reduction in our net contribution to the Community budget in 1986 compared with that in respect of the Council's Second Reading budget is estimated at around £250 million. The main reason for this reduction is the increase in the United Kingdom's abatement of 500 mecu (£310 million). This will mean that our gross contribution to the 1986 budget will be less than our gross contribution to the Council's Second Reading budget, and our VAT rate will fall from 0·69 per cent. to 0·68 per cent. We shall also benefit from additional receipts resulting from the extra expenditure contained in the new budget. The increase in our receipts from the structural funds could be of the order of £150 million.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his policy towards the financing of the 1987 European Economic Community budget solely by the 1·4 per cent. value added tax levy plus the other funds levied by the European Economic Community in accordance with the Treaty of Rome, without the provision of additional funds from intergovernmental agreements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The Government consider that the 1987 European Communities' budget should be financed solely from the revenue described in the Commission's revenue forecasts for 1987 in accordance with the treaty. We see no case for the provision of any additional funds.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the policy of the Council of Finance Ministers towards making provision for 1986 European Economic Community spending to be carried forward to 1987.

Mr. Brooke: The Council's recent decisions on the 1986 budget were influenced by a concern to avoid where possible the carrying forward of expenditure from 1986 into 1987.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the basic difference between commitment appropriations and payment appropriations as set out in the statement of 11 July, Official Report, column 621.

Mr. Brooke: Commitment appropriations lay down the level of commitments which may be entered into during the year. In the case of agricultural guarantee expenditure, and some other parts of the budget, these commitment appropriations must be matched in the budget by equivalent payment appropriations, as the entry into the contract and its payment take place simultaneously. These are known as non-differentiated appropriations. Where such commitments may not be liquidated immediately, as inmost of the structural funds and non-obligatory expenditure, separate commitment and payment appropriations (differentiated appropriations) are provided. Payment appropriations therefore comprise the maximum amounts which are payable during the budgetary year towards the relevant commitments entered into by the Commission.

Mr. Teddy Taylor, asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the principal factors which led to the estimate by the Council of Finance Ministers that payment appropriations in the revised 1986 budget, should exceed the 1985 total by 39·18 per cent., as set out in the statement of 11 July, Official Report, column 621.

Mr. Brooke: The increase agreed for non-obligatory expenditure payments appropriations took account of the extra costs arising from enlargement of the Community through the accession of Spain and Portugal. The increase also allowed for a reduction of the so-called cost of the past, whereby the size of commitments which the Commission is authorised to enter into has exceeded the payments appropriations available for carrying them out.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the principal factors which led to the estimate by the Council of Finance Ministers that commitment appropriations in the revised 1986 budget should exceed the 1985 total by 14·54 per cent., as set out in the statement of 11 July, Official Report, column 621.

Mr. Brooke: The increase agreed for non-obligatory expenditure commitment appropriations was primarily to allow the structural funds to extend their activity to the new member states, Spain and Portugal.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why he is not seeking to invoke the 4 December 1984 agreement of the European Council to claw back in future years exceptional spending in 1986 within the European Economic Community; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: Article 5 of the budget discipline conclusions refers to agricultural expenditure. We shall, of course, be seeking to ensure that agricultural guarantee expenditure in future years is limited in accordance with the financial guideline and that the provisions of article 5 are respected.

Pensions

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update his answer of 19 October 1982, Official Report, columns 82-87, relating to public sector pensions, to the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Brooke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Trustee Savings Bank

Mr. Cabora asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why he is appointing Monday 21 July as the vesting day for the TSB in view of the fact that the Treasury gave an assurance during the Lords hearing that no vesting date would be named until after the full judgment was available.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Treasury gave no such assurance. In advance of their Lordships' judgments, in view of the differences in approach taken by the lower courts, counsel for the treasury explained the potential imporance of having the full text of their Lordships' opinions. However, the judgments, which were given without delay on 3 July, were unequivocal in finding unanimously against the appellant depositors on all counts. Having taken legal advice and consulted the TSB central board, as required by the Trustee Savings Banks Act 1985, the Government concluded that the judgments provided no basis for further delaying the implementation of the Act.

Gross Domestic Product

Mr. Wilson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has as to the gross domestic product per capita, expressed in terms of $US, for each of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries in 1984 and in 1985.

Mr. MacGregor: Following is a table showing comparable figures for OECD countries.

Source: OECD Monthly Economic Indicators, June 1986.

Mr. Wilson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give figures for the financial years 1983-84, 1984-85, and 1985-86 to show the gross domestic product of the United Kingdom continental shelf region.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Charities

Mr. Moynihan asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to publicise the new tax reliefs for charitable giving.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Inland Revenue is today publishing, under the title "Tax Aid", two leaflets explaining the tax reliefs which will now be available for gifts to charities. These are designed to help both donors and charities to take full advantage of the new reliefs we have introduced.

One of the leaflets includes an explanation of the new scheme for tax relief for donations up to £100 a year under payroll giving schemes. Although the new relief does not start until April 1987, forward planning for schemes will be necessary and I hope that many employers will take part in the scheme and that charities and employees will encourage them to do so.

The other leaflet includes a description of the relief for single donations by companies (other than close companies) up to 3 per cent. of their ordinary annual dividends. This relief, which is additional to the existing relief for charitable contributions made under deed of covenant, is available for payments made on or after 1 April 1986.

Together with the abolition of the £10,000 limit on higher rate relief for covenanted donations by individuals, these measures constitute the most substantial package of reliefs for charitable giving ever introduced. They have been very widely welcomed by the charities themselves and I hope that the public in turn will respond generously in supporting the valuable work charities carry out. In the Budget we forecast the cost of the new reliefs at £60 million in 1987-88, but that is intended only as an estimate and not as an upper limit on the relief available. If the new reliefs stimulate greater contributions to charity than we have anticipated, we will be only too pleased. The "Tax Aid" leaflets should help to ensure that the new possibilities are as widely known and understood as possible.

Mileage Allowance

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to the reply to the hon. Member for Leicester, East of 3 June, Official Report, column 471, if any exemptions have been made for any categories of persons to the general rule regarding the taxation of mileage allowance paid for travel between home and work; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 11 June 1986, c. 198]: Allowances paid to cover the cost of travel between home and the usual place of work in the United Kingdom are normally taxable. However, the tax treatment may vary either where an employee's duties take him away from his usual place of work or the workplace is constantly changing. Allowances relating to leave travel of members of Her Majesty's armed forces and home to work travel of the seriously and permanently disabled are exempt from tax.

Incomes

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the number of people in 1985-86, counting husbands and wives separately, with investment income and/or earned income of less than (a) £10, (b) £15 and (c) £20 a week, showing those above retirement age separately.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 17 July 1986, c. 606.]: Approximate estimates are given in the table. Since records are not kept by the Inland Revenue for many persons with small incomes below the tax threshold, the estimates have been based on projections from recent family expenditure surveys. The information can be taken only as an approximate guide in view of the small sample size and incomplete coverage of these surveys.

Section DS19

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will explain the functions of his Department's section DS19.

Mr. Stanley: Defence Secretariat 19 was disbanded in September 1983. It was formed to advise the then Secretary of State for Defence on how best to explain to the public the facts about the Government's policy on deterrence and multilateral disarmament.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the number of staff and the annual expenditure of his Department's section DS19 in each year since its inception.

Mr. Stanley: Defence Secretariat 19 was set up in February 1983 and disbanded in September 1983. The number of staff employed was eight and the costs of the unit were confined to the salaries of those eight posts and associated administrative costs which totalled approximately £142,000 at 1983 prices.

South Africa

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy henceforth to refuse permission to officers of the British forces to serve in the South African Defence Force.

Mr. Stanley: Under the Government's present policies any request for a serving officer of the armed forces of the United Kingdom to be attached to the South African defence forces would be refused.

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of the measures taken to prohibit all forms of military co-operation with South Africa, as agreed in the Commonwealth accord on Southern Africa adopted on 20 October 1985.

Mr. Stanley: The last major defence arrangement between the two countries, the 1955 agreements on the Simonstown naval base (Cmnd. 9520) were terminated by an exchange of letters between Governments in June 1975 (Cmnd. 6229). The United Kingdom operated a voluntary arms embargo against South Africa from 1974 and then introduced legislation in 1978 in order to comply with UN Security Council resolution 418 which imposed a mandatory arms embargo with South Africa. The United Kingdom does not import arms, ammunition and military vehicles produced in South Africa in accordance with UN Security Council resolution 558. In addition, no South African service men have received training at British military establishments, nor have British service men received training at South African military establishments, since 1976. As my right hon. Friend the then Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs announced on 20 November 1985 in column 263, the British military attachés in Pretoria have been withdrawn.

Virgin Atlantic Challenger

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) of 7th July, Official Report, column 7, when the operational training sortie referred to was planned; and what was its estimated cost.

Mr. Freeman: The RAF Nimrod operational training sortie was planned some two months in advance and was approved in accordance with standing instructions. The estimated cost of the sortie based on the hourly flying rate was about £50,000.

Government and the Media (Study)

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make available copies of the studies into relations between the Government and the media commissioned in 1982 from King's college, London and University college, Cardiff; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Younger: I have placed copies of the study by King's College, London into "Unofficial commentary in the media on military aspects of the Falklands Campaign 1982" in the Library. I have also placed in the Library copies of the study by the Centre for Journalism Studies at University college, Cardiff, into "Relations between Government, the Armed Forces and the media in time of armed conflict". The second study contains a large number of recommendations which are being considered in parallel with the work that is already taking place on the Beach report on censorship. I am grateful to the authors of both these studies for the work they have done.

Departmental Contracts

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Defence if, in the light of the recent contract awarded for the transport of formaldehyde to Gruinard Island, he will make it his policy that his Department be involved in the selection of subcontractors in similar cases.

Mr. Lee: No. In general, it is the Ministry's policy to make its contractors fully responsible for the conduct of the work required, including the selection of any sub-contractors.

Land

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Defence what area of land is owned by his Department in (a) England, (b) Wales and (c) Scotland.

Mr. Freeman: Ministry of Defence land and forshore holdings, at 1 April 1986, are set out below:

England

Land:
Freehold: 425,370 acres
Leasehold: 18,737 acres

Foreshore:
Freehold: 25,693 acres

United States Service Men

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many United States service men are stationed at (a) Machrihanish, (b) Holy Loch, (c) Edzell and (d) Thurso.

Mr. Stanley: Information on the number of United States service personnel at these facilities is compiled annually. As at October 1985, the figures were as follows:

	Number
Machrihanish	91
Holy Loch	1,881
Edzell	759
Thurso	175

Dismissals on Courts Martial

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many Royal Naval officers and how many ratings have been dismissed from the service or court-martialled in each of the last five years;

(2) how many RAF officers and how many men have been court-martialled or dismissed from the service in each of the last five years;

(3) how many Army officers and how many men have been dismissed from the service or court-martialled in each of the last five years.

Mr. Freeman: [pursuant to his reply, 11 July 1986, c. 306]: The information requested is as follows:

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many letters from hon. Members to his Department still awaiting a substantive reply were received more than (a) one month ago, (b) two months ago, (c) three months ago and (d) four months ago; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Younger [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1986, c. 428]: A check of our records has indicated that 17 letters from hon. Members received between one and two months ago are awaiting a ministerial reply.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Sayeed asked the Paymaster General what are the latest figures available for the number of self-employed in Bristol, East; and what was the comparable figure in 1979.

Mr. Lang: The latest available information comes from the 1981 census of population which identified 2,495 self-employed persons resident in Bristol, East.

A comparable figure for 1979 is not available.

Mr. Wilson asked the Paymaster General if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the latest non-seasonally adjusted percentage unemployment figures for (a) England, (b) Scotland, (c) Wales and (d) Northern Ireland.

Mr. Lang: The following information is available in the Library. The table shows the numbers of unemployed claimants in the areas requested on 12 June 1986, expressed as a percentage of the working population.

	Per cent.
England	11·1
Scotland	14·0
Northern Ireland	18·6

Mr. Wilson asked the Paymaster General what was the precentage increase in unemployment from 1975 to 1985 in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) Scotland, (c) Wales, (d) Northern Ireland and (e) England; and what information he has about the increase in (i) the original seven European Economic Community countries as a whole and (ii) the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries as a whole.

Mr. Lang: Following is the available information. The figures are not fully comparable because of national differences in coverage and methods of compilation.

Per cent. increase in unemployment: 1975 to 1985

	Per cent.
United Kingdom	262
Scotland	230
Wales	230
Northern Ireland	222
England	271

Total OECD*	175

Note:

The figures for countries for the United Kingdom are based on the seasonally adjusted series which allows for discontinuation in coverage.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General what is the most recent estimate for the increase in the labour force between 1986 and 1990; and what is his estimate of the total numbers in the labour force in 1990.

Mr. Lang: The civilian labour force in Great Britain is projected to increase by 380,000 between mid-1986 and mid-1990, to reach a level of 27,198,000.

National Manpower Council of South Africa

Mr. Caborn asked the Paymaster General what was the purpose of the visit by Dr. Barker of the National Manpower Council of South Africa to his Department.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I understand that he is a senior official who expressed an interest to learn about my Department's employment and training programmes.

Mr. Caborn asked the Paymaster General who Dr. Barker of the National Manpower Council of South Africa met in the Department of Employment.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The head of my Department's economics branch.

Mr. Caborn asked the Paymaster General how many visits have been made to his Department by the National Manpower Council of South Africa in the past two years; and whether any more are planned.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The recent visit by Dr. Barker is the only such visit of which my Department has any record. We have received no request for any further such visit.

Wages Inspectors

Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General how many wages council inspectors are currently in post in the north-west region; what is the proposed figure for 1987; and what was the comparable figure in 1979.

Mr. Trippier: Currently there are 15 outdoor wages inspectors in post in the north-west region. It is planned to reduce the number of posts to 10 in 1987. There were 21 outdoor inspectors in post in 1979.

Employee Protection

Mr. Janner asked the Paymaster General if Her Majesty's Government are refusing to accept the EEC draft directives designed to provide additional protection for employees at work.

Mr. Lang: In considering any proposals for employment protection legislation the rights and interests of people in employment have to be balanced against the needs of the unemployed. It must be a major priority for the Community to improve the operation of the labour market to create the conditions for employment growth. The Government's position on particular proposals is determined in that light.

Disabled People

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Paymaster General what consideration he has given to the employment of disabled people in the financial services sector in the light of the findings of the Banking Insurance and Finance Union's survey of disabled people, a copy of which has been sent to him; if there is any action he plans to take; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: I am obliged to the right hon. Member for sending me a copy of the Banking Insurance and Finance Union's survey report. As he will realise, this has only just arrived and it is an interim report. I therefore look forward to seeing the final report and will consider the implications of the findings then.

Area Manpower Boards

Mr. Sheerman asked the Paymaster General if he will publish the criteria for business and industry nominations to area manpower boards; and whether people from co-operative businesses are eligible.

Mr. Trippier: Nominations for the five employer representatives on area manpower boards are agreed by MSC's regional directors with the CBI at regional level. The names put forward by the CBI need not necessarily be CBI members: others, including, for example, local chambers of commerce and the Co-operative Union, are welcome to identify possible members who can be proposed by the CBI.

Within the criteria set by the Manpower Services Commission, the overiding factor is that the employer representatives should reflect the "structure of employment" in the area concerned. Smaller as well as larger firms should be represented, and the commercial and service sectors should be represented alongside manufacturing industry. In rural areas the importance of agriculture and related services should also be reflected.

Community Programme

Mr. Sheerman asked the Paymaster General when, pursuant to his answer of 7 July, Official Report, column 16, he expects to provide the hon. Member for Huddersfield with the information sought; and if he will give reasons for the delay (a) in publishing a summary of the second postal follow-up survey of community programme participants and (b) in providing a full analysis of the results of the survey.

Mr. Lang: I replied to the hon. Member on 14 July at columns 363-64.

The report of the second postal follow-up survey of community programme participants was placed in the Library on 13 March 1986. This did not represent any significant delay.

This report constitutes a full analysis of the survey to the extent that the information contained within it can be regarded as statistically reliable.

Wages Councils

Mr. Dixon asked the Paymaster General what guidance his Department has given to wages councils about the conduct of their business while the Wages Bill is being considered in Parliament.

Mr. Trippier: No such guidance has been issued but all members of councils have been made aware of the relevant provisions of the Bill.

Mr. Dixon asked the Paymaster General how many wages councils have deferred their normal business pending enactment of the Wages Bill.

Mr. Trippier: I understand from the secretary to wages councils that one council has deferred consideration of proposals for a new wages order until the future legislative position becomes clearer.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Craigen asked the Paymaster General if he consulted the Equal Opportunities Commission prior to the publication of his proposals to raise the hours of work threshold for employment rights and to exempt small firms from mothers' right of return; and why he does not propose to consult now on these proposals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. The chairman of the Equal Opportunities Commission has now written to my right hon. and noble Friend setting out the Commission's views on these proposals. Small firms are not and will not be exempt from the obligations to reinstate employees after maternity absence where it is reasonably practicable to do so.

Worker Participation

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Paymaster General what progress has been made in European Economic Community discussions on the Vredling directive on worker participation in industry; if it is his intention, in his capacity as President of the Council, that further discussions on this measure will be on the basis of majority voting under article 100; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: On June 5 the EC Council of Social Affairs Ministers recalled that last June it had noted the major difficulties which the draft so-called "Vredling" directive would cause for those member states with a tradition of voluntary collective agreements. The Council further decided that discussion of the proposal would not be resumed until 1989.

Enterprise Boards

Sir Russell Johnston asked the Paymaster General whether his Department is reviewing the funding made available from the European social fund to local authority funded enterprise boards.

Mr. Lang: No. Decisions on individual applications to the European social fund are the responsibility of the European Commission.

This Department keeps the operation of the fund under continuous review and is regularly in touch with the Commission about it.

Sir Russell Johnston asked the Paymaster General what steps he is taking during his presidency of the European Council of Ministers to ensure that enterprise boards in Lancashire and Yorkshire will continue to qualify for European regional development fund and European social fund funding.

Mr. Tracey: I have been asked to reply.

I know of no proposal by the European Commission affecting the eligibility of enterprise boards for grants from the European regional development or social funds.

Agricultural Inspectorate

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Paymaster General if he will publish in the Official Report the number of additional inspectors that will be employed by the Agricultural Inspectorate for the enforcement of the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985.

Mr. Trippier: The total number of agricultural inspectors in post on 1 July 1986 was 160. The Health and Safety Executive has said that it will meet its responsibilities for enforcing the Food and Environment Protection Act. This will have to be done with existing staff through rearrangement of priorities since two or three years are required to recruit and train fully effective new inspectors. Active recruitment to the Agricultural Inspectorate is nevertheless currently under way.

Irish Nationals

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Paymaster General if he will estimate how many Irish nationals are currently working in the United Kingdom; and how many of these are drawing unemployment benefit.

Mr. Lang: Preliminary labour force survey results for the spring of 1985 indicate that there were about 268,000 persons of Irish nationality in employment in the United Kingdom. The number of those who reported that they were also claiming benefit was too small to be measurable by the labour force survey.

Employment Programmes

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General what is the latest figure for the numbers in (a) the YTS and (b) each special employment programme; and in each case what is his estimate of (i) the reduction in unemployment as a result, (ii) the gross cost per person on the programme and (iii) the net cost per person on the programme.

Mr. Lang: The figures for the numbers supported by YTS and the employment measures are given in the table.

It is difficult to calculate precisely the effect on the unemployment count of employment measures; their estimated average effectiveness was set out in table 3.7.13 of the public expenditure White Paper together with details of the gross and net costs, (Cmnd. 9702). YTS is a permanent training scheme.

Great Britain

Measure	May
Enterprise allowance scheme	58,000
Community industry	8,000
Community programme	216,000
Job relase scheme	38,000
Job splitting scheme	275
Young workers scheme	36,000
YTS	250,327

Retraining

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General if he will list each adult retraining scheme, the numbers on it, projected numbers for 1987, 1988 and 1989, and the most recent estimate of the cost per place.

Mr. Trippier: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General how many of those who complete the YTS, and what proportion, are retained in full employment in (a) the public sector and (b) the private sector.

Mr. Trippier: Information is not available on the proportion of YTS leavers who are retained in work in the public sector and private sector. The latest survey results, covering those who left YTS between April 1985 and January 1986, show that 28 per cent. of all leavers and 41 per cent. of all who completed their time on YTS, where in work with the same employer who provided their training some three months later. Altogether 57 per cent. of leavers were in employment and two thirds either in work or full-time education and training.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people claimed supplementary benefit in Stretford constituency in (a) 1979 and (b) 1985; what percentage change that represents; and what was the percentage change in (i) staff handling supplementary benefit and (ii) all staff at his Department's local offices for the same period.

Mr. Major: Stretford is covered by three of the Department's offices, Rusholme, Chorlton and Sale, but their boundaries are not conterminous with the boundary of the constituency.

Comprehensive figures are not available before 1982-83 and information on the number of individuals who claimed supplementary benefit is not available in the form requested.

Information that is available is as follows:

Direct comparisons between numbers of staff and claims are misleading as work loads vary considerably by type and duration of claim and the action that has to be taken. All these factors vary over time as a result of legislative, policy and procedural changes. Examples of such changes are the introduction of Housing Benefit and postal claim forms.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many children in Scotland were living in families below supplementary benefit level, on supplementary benefit, and with incomes up to 140 per cent. of supplementary benefit level, classified by employment status; whether they were in one or two parent families in 1983 on the latest basis and on a basis comparable with 1981 and 1979; and what proportion these children made up the total number of children;

(2) if he can estimate, following the publication of the low income family tables for 1983, to what level (a) family income supplement and (b) child benefit would need to be raised to ensure that all working families with children have an income above the supplementary benefit entitlement, on the same basis as his reply of 30 July 1984 to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), Official Report, column 109.

Mr. Major: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) on 8 July at column 157. When the tables are published, I will then be in a position to reply to the hon. Member's questions.

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people claimed supplementary benefit in the Birmingham, Ladywood constituency in (a) 1979 and (b) 1985; what percentage change that represents; and what was the percentage change in (i) staff handling supplementary benefit and (ii) all staff at his Department's local offices for the same period.

Mr. Major: Birmingham, Ladywood is covered by three of the Department's offices, Edgbaston, Handsworth and Ladywood, but their boundaries are not conterminous with the boundary of the constituency.

Comprehensive figures are not available before 1980-81 and information on the number of individuals who claimed supplementary benefit is not available in the form requested.

*Based on a 100 per cent. count of cases in action at February.

Direct comparisons between numbers of staff and claims are misleading as work loads vary considerably by type and duration of claim and the action that has to be taken. All these factors vary over time as a result of legislative, policy and procedural changes. Examples of such changes are the introduction of housing benefit and postal claim forms.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many staff were dealing with supplementary benefits at the Canning Town and Plaistow social security offices in 1979 and 1985, respectively; what was the percentage change; and if will also give the comparable figures of changes in staff numbers for all purposes over the same year;

(2) if he will state, or estimate, the number of persons claiming supplementary benefits at the Canning Town and Plaistow social security offices in 1979 and 1985, and the respective percentage increases.

Mr. Major: Comprehensive figures are not available before 1982-83 and information on the number of individuals who claimed supplementary benefit is not available in the form requested. Information that is available is as follows:

Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many people claimed supplementary benefit in Preston in (a) 1979 and (b) 1985; and what percentage change that represents;

(2) what was the percentage change in (a) staff handling supplementary benefit and (b) all staff at the local offices of his Department between 1979 and 1985.

(2) how many extra staff have been deployed in the Department of Health and Social Security ILOs of Middlesbrough, Stockton, Hartlepool, Redcar and Eston in order to deal with work generated by the Cleveland county council benefits take-up campaign.

Mr. Major: I shall let the right hon. and hon. Members have replies as soon as possible.

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people claimed supplementary benefit in the Bootle constituency in (a) 1979 and (b) 1985; what percentage change that represents; what was the percentage change in: (a) staff handling supplementary benefit and (b) all staff at the local offices of his Department over the same period.

Mr. Major: Bootle is covered by two of the Department's offices, Bootle and Crosby, but their boundaries are not conterminous with the boundary of the constituency.

Comprehensive figures are not available before 1982-83 and information on the number of individuals who claimed supplementary benefit is not available in the form requested.

legislative, policy and procedural changes. Examples of such changes are the introduction of housing benefit and postal claim forms.

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many people claimed supplementary benefit in the parliamentary constituency of Brent, East in (a) 1979 and (b) 1985; and what percentage change that represents;

(2) how many staff there were in his Department's offices in the Brent, East constituency in (a) 1979 and (b) 1985; how many of these were responsible for handling supplementary benefit claims; and what was the percentage change in both cases.

Mr. Major: Brent, East is covered by three of the Department's offices, Cricklewood, Neasden and Harlesden, but their boundaries are not conterminous with the boundary of the constituency.

Comprehensive figures are not available before 1982-83 and information on the number of individuals who claimed supplementary benefit is not available in the form requested.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has received the report of the Social Security Advisory Committee on the proposed reductions in supplementary benefit payments for mortgage interest; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: No.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people in Scotland in 1983 were (i) below, (ii) at and (iii) up to 140 per cent. of the supplementary benefit level on the latest basis and on a basis comparable with 1979 and 1981; what percentage of the total population they represent in each case; what his estimate is of the number of children living in such households in each case; and what percentage of total children they represent in each case.

Mr. Major: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the proportion of United Kingdom gross domestic product expended on (a) teachers' pay and (b) nurses' pay, for each year since 1970.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that this information is not available for the years prior to 1975-76. For the remaining years the information requested is as follows:

Mr. Hayhoe: A new edition of my Department's leaflet SA35 entitled "Protect your health abroad" containing fuller information about acquired immune deficiency syndrome will be ready for distribution by travel agencies and others during the autumn.

Attendance Allowance

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much was spent on attendance allowance in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Major: The information requested is given in table 3.15 of the Government's Expenditure Plans 1986-87 to 1988-89 (Cmnd. 9702-II), a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people are now receiving attendance allowance.

Mr. Newton: At 31 March 1985, the latest date for which information is available, an estimated 543,000 people were receiving attendance allowance.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average time taken to deal with individual claims for attendance allowance at his Department's Norcross office for the last three years for which figures are available.

Mr. Newton: The information is as follows:

Date	Average time (weeks)
March 1983	12½
March 1984	10
March 1985	9
March 1986	8½

Invalid Care Allowance

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he is taking to contact married women likely to be eligible to receive the invalid care allowance; what publicity material is being produced to alert married women carers to their possible eligibility; and when this material will be made available.

Mr. Newton: Wherever possible we will be writing individually during the next few weeks to recipients of attendance allowance and constant attendance allowance to advise them that if they have a carer who is a married woman or lives with a man as his wife she may now qualify for invalid care allowance.

An explanation of the new rules is already in production and will be issued in the next few days as an insert to the current invalid care allowance leaflet. A new leaflet with a revised claim form will be available in August. The changes will be advertised in August in the national press and some magazines. The advertisement will include a coupon for ordering the new leaflet. The Department's regional information officers will be explaining the new rules in radio and TV broadcasts.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people were receiving invalid care allowance at the latest date for which information is available.

Mr. Newton: 10,906 as at 30 June 1986.

Family Income Supplement

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total number of families now in receipt of family income supplement; and what is the average amount of benefit received by these families.

Mr. Major: At the end of March 1986, the latest date for which figures are available, 201,000 families were receiving family income supplement and the average amount of benefit received was £13·30 weekly.

Hospitals (Maintenance)

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much has been spent on the repair and maintenance of National Health Service hospitals at constant prices in each of the past five years; and what percentage of National Health Service expenditure this represented.

Mr. Whitney: Following are the figures derived from the annual accounts of health authorities in England:

	Hospital services-building maintenance expenditure £ million (at 1984-85 prices)	*Percentage of total NHS current expenditure
1980-81	155·7	1·4
1981-82	166·1	1·4
1982-83	157·0	1·3

1984-85	156·5	1·3

* Including family practitioner services.

School Dental Service

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average number of teeth extracted per full-time dental officer in the school dental service.

Mr. Hayhoe: The average number of teeth extracted from school children per dental officer engaged in clinical duties, based on whole time equivalents, in the community dental service in England was 379 in 1985.

Mobility Allowance

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average time taken to deal with individual mobility allowances claims at his Department's Norcross office for the last three years for which figures are available.

Mr. Newton: The information is as follows:

Date	Average time (weeks)
June 1983	14·5
June 1984	13·0
June 1985	9·5
June 1986	8·5

Ambulance Service

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many patients were unable (a) to keep appointments with consultants and (b) attend day care due to lack of ambulances to take them to hospital for each of the last three months for which figures are available.

Mr. Whitney: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Pike: asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many ambulance men were employed at each ambulance station on 1 May in the current year and for the last five years in Lancashire;

(2) how many journeys ambulances made for each station in Lancashire in the first week in May in each of the last five years; and how many patients were not provided with ambulance transport although requested by hospitals or doctors.

Mr. Whitney: We do not hold such information centrally. The hon. Member may therefore wish to address his inquiries to the chairman of Preston health authority, which is responsible for the management of Lancashire ambulance service.

Artificial Sweeteners

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, pursuant to his answer of 30 June, Official Report, column 416, he will ask the panel of Committee on Medical Aspects of Food Policy inquiring into sugar to examine intense and artificial sweeteners as well.

Mr. Whitney: The Committee on Medical Aspects of Food Policy, which is formulating the terms of reference for the panel that will examine the role of sugars in the diet, will consider whether intense and artificial sweeteners should be included within the remit.

Invalidity Pension and Allowance

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much was spent on (i) invalidity pension, (ii) invalidity allowance and (iii) the additional component to invalidity pension in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Major: The information requested is as follows:

(i)	1,892
(ii)	161
(iii)	100

All figures relate to 1984-85, the latest year for which information is available.

Invalidity Benefit

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people at the latest date for which information is available were receiving invalidity benefit: (i) with the higher rate invalidity allowance, (ii) with the middle rate invalidity allowance, (iii) with the lower rate invalidity allowance and (iv) with the additional component.

Mr. Major: As at 30 March 1985, the latest date for which the information is available, the numbers of recipients were:

	Number
(i)	211,000
(ii)	176,000
(iii)	321,000
(iv)	528,000

Severe Disablement Allowance

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people were receiving severe disablement allowance at the latest date for which information is available.

Mr. Newton: As at March 1985, about 252,000 people were receiving a severe disablement allowance. In the year to March 1986, provisional figures indicate that a further 10,700 people have been awarded the allowance.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the cost of paying the severe disablement allowance to all those who would qualify under the rules that applied to the non-contributory invalidity pension but including married and cohabiting women and what would be this cost if the severe disablement allowance were increased by £7·35 for the single person's rate.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1986, c. 419]: The estimated additional cost in a full year would be about £290 million and £380 million, respectively.

Retirement Pensions

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people were receiving retirement pensions at the latest date for which information is available.

Mr. Major: The latest date for which information is available is September 1985, when the number of people receiving retirement pensions was in excess of 9,561,000.

Mobility and Attendance Allowances

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the number of people receiving (a) mobility allowance and (b) attendance allowance for each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) on 26 February at columns 602-3.

Students

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to the answer of 23 June, Official Report, columns 70-1, how many of the 140,000 students living away from home who will gain the full increase in the grant (a) are dependent upon their parents, (b) claim social security benefits during short vacations, (c) live in college accommodation, (d) claim housing benefit or (e) are absent from their accommodation during the summer vacation.

Mr. Newton: The 140,000 students mentioned are those who claim neither housing benefit, nor supplementary benefit or unemployment benefit in the short vacations. None of them therefore falls into category (b) or (d). None are treated as dependent on their parents for social security purposes, although some will depend on contributions from their parents for all or part of the maintenance grant. It is not known how many of them live in college accommodation, or are absent from their accommodation during the summer vacation; but, since they do not claim housing benefit, they will not be affected by the changes in entitlement in these areas.

Health Education Council

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any proposals to privatise the functions of the Health Education Council.

Mr. Whitney: No.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will give the number of people on the waiting lists for acute surgery every six months since 30 September 1982 for (a) each district health authority and special health authority in Greater London, (b) the health authorities in Greater London added together and (c) the health authorities in Inner London added together;

(2) if he will give the number of people on in-patient waiting lists every six months since 30 September 1982 for (a) each district health authority and special health authority in Greater London, (b) the health authorities in Greater London added together and (c) the health authorities in Inner London added together.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what further action he is taking to reduce waiting lists for National Health Service patients.

Mr. Fowler: The record of the Health Service in increasing the number of patients treated is excellent. Since 1978 the number of in-patient cases treated in English hospitals has increased from 5,370,000 to 6,178,000; day case attendances have gone up from 562,000 to 903,000; and out-patient attendances have increased from 33,950,000 to 37,043,000. These figures are all new records for the National Health Service.

Waiting lists have also come down. In England at 31 March 1979 they stood at 752,422. By September 1985 they had fallen to 661,249. This was in spite of industrial action in 1982 following which waiting lists rose by about 100,000 cases.

Further progress, however, is needed. In some places and for some kinds of treatment, people are having to wait too long. I have therefore asked the chairmen of the regional health authorities to initiate a new drive on long waiting lists and waiting times. I envisage action continuing over the next three years. The chairmen have been asked to start the process by reviewing the waiting lists and times for in-patient treatment in every district in the country. They have also been asked to review waiting times for out-patient treatment. Where these are unsatisfactory, they will ask the districts to establish why this is so, and to decide what needs to be done to improve matters. The regional health authorities will report by the end of October on the results of the review and on the proposals for action which they have agreed with the districts. Further action will then be put in hand.

Experience in a number of districts which have acted to reduce their waiting lists has shown that reorganisation and better co-ordination of existing resources can bring lists and waiting times down. Better planning of the use of staff, operating theatres and beds can enable more patients to be treated.

For example, NHS staff have already done much, by changing methods and introducing new techniques, to enable patients to be treated as day cases and to reduce lengths of stay in hospital. By these and other means further progress will be possible.

I know that health authorities share my view that we should make a sustained attack on long waiting lists and times.

Senior Registrars

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many senior registrars are in post in each specialty; and how many have been given consultants' posts in each of the last five years.

Mr. Hayhoe: The numbers of senior registrars in post in each specialty are set out in table 1:

School Meals

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assessment he has made of the health implications of the removal of the school meals service by some local education authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: All local education authorities are required to provide free school meals for those who qualify to receive them and no local education authority has ceased to undertake this duty.

Psoriasis

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many persons are psoriasis sufferers in England and Wales in each of the past three years.

Mr. Whitney: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member information in precisely the form requested. The majority of psoriasis sufferers are treated by general practitioners or as hospital out-patients and diagnostic information is not held centrally on these patients. The available information is given in the table. Figures for Wales are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Estimated number of in-patient cases with main diagnosis of psoriasis and similar disorders	6,910	7,170	7,730

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to put psoriasis on the prescribed list of prescription exemptions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Hospitals (Cigarettes)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what advice has been given by his Department about the sale and use of cigarettes in hospitals and other health service premises; if he will seek powers to reverse decisions by health authorities not to ban the sale of cigarettes in the premises they administer; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: Guidance was issued to health authorities last year with a view to making non-smoking normal practice on Health Service premises and for Health Service staff. It asks authorities not to allow the sale of tobacco products on National Health Service premises, with the possible exception of long-stay, psychiatric or mental handicap establishments. I will be glad to look into any cases where this guidance is not being followed.

Board and Lodging Allowance (Ipswich)

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will give the names and addresses of the establishments in Ipswich where boarders receive his Department's payments for board and lodging allowance.

Mr. Newton: I regret that the information requested is confidential and cannot be disclosed.

Pregnant Women (Vitamin Supplementation)

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations he has received about the value of vitamin supplementation for prospective and pregnant mothers who are at risk of having handicapped children who suffer from spina bifida or other neural tube defects.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Women and Children (Domestic Violence)

Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he intends to ensure that women and children who have had to leave their homes and possessions as a result of domestic violence will be exempted from restrictions of entitlement to single payments under the Supplementary Benefit (Amendments Regulation) 1986.

Mr. Newton: I refer the right hon. Member to my statement to the House earlier today, when the Supplementary Benefit (Miscellaneous Amendment) Regulations 1986 were laid. The regulations make specific provision for claimants who have had to leave their previous home due to fear of domestic violence and are in need of furniture and bedding on obtaining a further tenancy.

North Western Regional Health Authority

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when, pursuant to his answer of 7 July, Official Report, columns 77-8, he will be publishing the report on North Western regional health authority computerisation referred to.

Mr. Whitney: Health authorities are expected to consider audit reports in public session and, unless there are compelling reasons to the contrary, to make such reports available to the general public. I understand that the North Western regional health authority considered this report at its meeting on 27 May 1986. The hon. Member may therefore wish to approach the chairman of that authority for the information he seeks.

General Practitioners (Work Load)

Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assessment he has made of the effect of old people being discharged from hospitals into homes in the community on the work loads of general practitioners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Old People's Homes

Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has to the number of private homes for old people operating in west Yorkshire; and if he will list them by district, giving the number of residents in such homes by districts.

Mr. Whitney: "Health and Personal Social Services Statistics for England 1986" edition will be published shortly.

Hospital Beds

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will update the information on bed numbers given in his answer of 1 July 1985, Official Report, column 49, so as to give data for 1985 and 1986 to date.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have such information as can be obtained without incurring disproportionate cost as soon as possible.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will update the information given in his answer of 1 July 1985, Official Report, column 51, on bed numbers, so as to give data for 1984 and 1985.

Mr. Whitney: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member all the information he seeks. The 1985 figures are not yet available. Figures for 1984 are given in the table.

Personal Social Services

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set out the total gross expenditure, current and capital, on personal social services, deflated by gross domestic product, retail price index and the index of social services pay and prices for each year since 1970.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Pensions

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the rise in the basic state pension rate at each uprating from 1979 up to and including July 1986 (a) in cash terms and (b) as a percentage increase above or below the retail price index increase during the same period.

Mr. Major: The information requested is as follows:

NHS (Expenditure)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will update the information on National Health expenditure provided in his answer of 1 July 1985, Official Report, column 47, to include 1985-86 and an estimate for 1986-87.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Departmental Offices

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to reply to the letter of 17 June from the hon. Member for East Lothian concerning advice from the East Edinburgh office of his Department about the delay in processing applications for single payments.

Mr. Major: I am writing to the hon. Member.

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he is taking to increase staff complements in his Department's offices in Glasgow to handle the growth in the number of benefit claims.

Mr. Major: I refer the hon. Member to the reply from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to my hon. Friend the Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Stevens) on 7 March at column 322, in which he announced a major improvement to DHSS manpower. Over 5,000 staff have been made available in addition to the normal complement. Glasgow's share of the increase is 250. A full complement review of staffing in social security local offices is currently being carried out and the results will form the basis of the 1987-88 complement.

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the current average time for clearing (a) new claims for supplementary benefit, (b) claims for additional weekly supplementary benefits, (c) claims for single payments and (d) urgent needs claims for each of the Department of Health and Social Security ILOs of Middlesbrough, Stockton, Hartlepool, Redcar and Eston.

Mr. Major: Claims are determined as soon as possible after all the information required has been collected; urgent claims are given priority.

Precise information about clearance times is not available but the local offices concerned estimate the present position to be as follows:

Average clearance time for	Middlesbrough ILO	Eston ILO	Redcar ILO	Hartlepool ILO	Stockton ILO
New/repeat claims for supplementary benefit	2-14 days	1-9 days	4 days	2-14 days	5-7 days
Claims for additional requirements	Not known	Not known	Not known	Not known	Not known
Claims for single payments	Up to 13 weeks	Up to 13 weeks	8½ weeks	Up to 16 weeks	Up to 13 weeks
Claims for urgent needs payments	Cleared on day of receipt	Cleared on day of receipt	Cleared on day of receipt	Cleared on day of receipt	Cleared on day of receipt

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many requests have been received, and how many such requests have been given favourable consideration under the discretionary power conferred upon the Secretary of State to exempt young people from the board and lodging time limits where exceptional hardship would otherwise be caused to the claimant or the claimant's partner under the Supplementary Benefits (Requirements) Regulations, Schedule 2A, paragraph 4 (m); and how many of the above figures relate to the Department of Health and Social Security ILOs of Middlesbrough, Stockton, Hartlepool, Redcar and Eston.

Mr. Major: One hundred and twenty-six requests have been received, of which 26 were successful. In respect of the individual offices mentioned by the hon. Member, four requests have been forwarded all from the local office in Middlesbrough. Of these, one was withdrawn as the claimant found rented accommodation and one was successful.

Severe Disablement and Invalid Care Allowance

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, pursuant to his answer of 14 July to the hon. Member for Sunderland, North, he will list separately the net and gross costs of the increases in severe disablement allowance and invalid care allowance there specified.

Mr. Newton: The available information is as follows:

		Gross additional cost in a full year	Net additional cost in a full year
Severe Disablement Allowance	(i)	200	120
	(ii)	2	*
Invalid Care Allowance	(i)	65	*
	(ii)	about ½	*

* I regret there are insufficient data available for a reliable estimate to be made of the net cost.

Member's Correspondence

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow can expect to receive a substantive answer to his letters of 28 April and 28 June concerning a constituent's unemployment benefit.

Mr. Major: My noble Friend replied to the hon. Member today.

Supplementary Benefit Single Payments

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what savings, in a full year, he estimates will arise as a result of the proposed changes to each of the supplementary benefit single payments, regulations Nos. 3, 7, 9, 10, 12, 13, 17, 19, 27, 28 and 30; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: On the basis of expenditure in the 1985-86 financial year, it is estimated that the broad effect of all the changes will be to reduce the level of expenditure on single payments by about £100 million in a full year. Information on expenditure on individual regulations is available only from the annual statistical inquiry, but this under-records the total number of payments made, and does not distinguish payments made on moving to a new home from payments made for replacement items to those who are not moving. For these reasons, and because the changes to some regulations are interrelated, it is not possible to provide details of savings for individual regulations.

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many single payments, and the amount thereof, were made in the last year for which figures are available under each of the supplementary benefit, single payments, regulations Nos. 7, 9, and 10, 12, 13, 17, 19, 27, 28 and 30 both nationally and for each of the Department of Health and Social Security ILOs of Middlesbrough, Stockton, Hartlepool, Redcar and Eston.

Mr. Newton: The latest available information on single payments made in Great Britain, identifying the regulation under which the payment was made, is shown in table 1. Local office statistics do not record the individual regulation number under which each single payment has been made, other than those made under regulation 30. Table 2 shows the latest available information on single payments under regulation 30, both nationally and for the local offices requested.

Table 1: Single payments made in Great Britain (by regulation)

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he intends to make any changes in the supplementary benefit single payments regulations with effect from 28 July.

Mr. Newton: [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1986, c. 417]: I refer the hon. Member to my statement in the House today.

Rates Contributions

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what arrangements he proposes in Scotland to give effect to that part of his social security proposals relating to rates contributions; if, in the light of Her Majesty's Government's proposals for abolition of rates in Scotland, such arrangements are likely to be of a transitional nature only; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We have always made it clear that our proposals on rates would need to be developed in the light of consultations and discussions on the wider proposals for the reform of local government finance. That remains the position.

Benefits

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has given local offices any guidance or instructions on co-operating with local authority run benefits take-up campaigns.

Mr. Major: Local offices are encouraged to discuss with local authorities any plans which they may have to run benefits take-up campaigns. Officials are considering whether more detailed guidance can usefully be provided.

Factor VIII

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied with the standard of factor VIII supplied by the manufacturers of Factorate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Supplementary Benefit and Pensions

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list for each region the latest estimate of the numbers claiming (a) supplementary benefit and (b) supplementary pensions: and if he will give the figures for 1979.

Mr. Major: The table shows the number of people receiving (a) supplementary allowance and (b) supplementary pension in each region on 6 May 1986.

	Supplementary Allowance	Supplementary Pension
Scotland	380,625	148,209
North East	549,110	254,294
North West	528,427	234,065
Midlands	567,520	266,274
Wales and Southwest	411,690	221,543
London North	527,098	281,704
London South	460,937	254,131

No direct comparison with 1979 can be made as a change in regional boundaries in 1982 reduced the total number of regions from 12 to seven.

The table shows the number of people receiving (a) supplementary allowance and (b) supplementary pension in each of the twelve regions on 15 May 1979.

	Supplementary Allowance	Supplementary Pension

Competitive Tendering

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to (a) efficiency savings, and (b) savings from competitive tendering achieved by (i) each regional health authority and (ii) each district health authority in each financial year 1979-80 to 1985-86.

Mr. Whitney: [pursuant to his reply, 30 June 1986, c. 427]: For the years 1981-82 to 1984-85, I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's reply to him on 14 February 1986, at column 596. Information on savings achieved in 1985-86 is not yet available for all regions, but we anticipate that regions collectively will have achieved their agreed target of releasing £120 million cash together with significant increases in activity within existing resources.

Board and Lodging

Mr. Neale asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what information he has as to how many non-British European Economic Community citizens claimed board and lodging allowances during the months of June on the purported grounds that they were looking for employment; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what steps he is taking to prevent non-British EEC citizens from coming to the United Kingdom for the purpose of claiming board and lodging benefits; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what records are kept by his Department of the numbers, country of origin and sums paid to non-British EEC citizens in board and lodging allowances on the basis of claims purported to be related to the search for jobs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1986, c. 420]: In June 1986, 90 claims for supplementary benefit from non-United Kingdom European Community nationals were recorded, compared with 116 in June 1985. Centrally collected figures do not identify board and lodging claimants separately within this total. Measures were strengthened last year to ensure that benefit is paid only to those EC claimants who are entitled to receive it. We have also recently stepped up action to combat hotel fraud.

Nurses and Doctors

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many (a) state registered nurses and (b) medical doctors are currently employed.

Mr. Hayhoe: [pursuant to his reply, 17 July 1986]: The Department of Employment is the source of statistical information on the unemployed, but I understand that information by occupation has not been available since the introduction of the voluntary registration procedure in October 1982.

ENVIRONMENT

Northern Ireland Flag

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will arrange for the flag of Northern Ireland to be flown alongside the flags of Wales, Scotland and England on public buildings in Whitehall for future state visits to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and on other suitable state occasions.

Mr. Tracey: The St. Patrick's flag is flown along side those of St. Andrew, St. George and the Red Dragon of Wales.

Water Authorities (Pollution)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if there have been any occasions in the last five years on which water authorities have been prosecuted for pollution offences; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department has not prosecuted any water authority in the last five years for pollution offences.

The comprehensive controls over discharges contained in part II of the Control of Pollution Act 1974 were brought into force only two years ago. The major review of consents undertaken as part of the implementation of the 1974 Act led to certain consents being granted subject to review after a specified period and to the water authority undertaking capital investment to improve effluent quality.

Islington

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the detailed criteria used to determine (a) grant-related expenditure assessments, (b) targets and (c) rate limits, for the London borough of Islington fo. each of the past four years.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer the hon. Member to the rate support grant reports and supplementary reports approved by the House for those years; and to the Department's annual publications "Grant-Related Expenditure, how the expenditure needs of local authorities are assessed for block grant" and "The Technical Handbook of Grant-Related Expenditure"—respectively the "Blue Book" and the "Green Book".

The criteria used to determine expenditure guidance (targets) are set out in annex E to the Rate Support Grant Report 1983-84 and in annex D to the Rate Support Grant Reports of 1984-85 and 1985-86 expenditure guidance was not issued for 1986-87.

Rate limitation first operated in 1985-86. Rate limits are determined in accordance with section 4 of the Rates Act 1984.

Copies of all these documents are in the Library.

Grant-Related Expenditure Allocation

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he proposes to make any changes in the factors used in assessing grant-related expenditure allocation.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend is considering a number of options for change arising from the grants working group's report to the Consultative Council on Local Government Finance on the grant-related expenditure development programme for 1987-88. His final decisions will take account of his consultations with local government.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will bring up to date the information concerning the Exchequer contribution to local government expenditure published in the Official Report on 1 March 1984, Official Report, columns 330-31, in reply to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby.

Mrs. Rumbold: The information is as follows:

Aggregate Exchequer grant as a percentage of relevant expenditure

England	*(a) At settlement	(b) At outturn†
1981-82	59·1	54·9
1982-83	56·1	51·7
1983-84	52·8	49·8
1984-85	51·9	49·6
1985-86	48·7	46·8
1986-87	46·4	44·1

* Percentages as given in the rate support grant settlement report.

† Aggregate Exchequer grant from latest supplementary report, or, in the case of 1986-87, as given in the rate support grant settlement report. Relevant expenditure from outturn forms returned to the Department, except 1985-86 (local authorities' revised estimates) and 1986-87 (budgets). Outturn percentages between 1981-82 and 1985-86 are affected by holdback of block grant.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he now proposes to accept the recommendation in the Widdicombe report for an immediate increase in the financial limit on spending under section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972 for metropolitan district and London borough councils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: I have decided to study whether special provision for local authorities to spend on economic development is desirable or necessary. The proper level of spending authority under section 137 is obviously dependant on decisions taken about economic development. I hope to be able to come to conclusions about this by early in the new year. Meanwhile, I have no plans for interim measures.

Local Authority Local Plans

Mr. Franks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discretion a local planning authority has to introduce alternative proposals to those contained in its deposited local plan.

Mr. Tracey: A local planning authority has discretion to introduce alternative proposals to those contained in its deposited local plan before, during or after any public local inquiry. The code of practice says that if this is done before the inquiry and time allows, the planning authority may advertise the changes and its reasons for them and allow a reasonable period for objections and representations. If there is insufficient time to advertise potential changes, the planning authority should still try to give objectors and any third parties a chance to comment on them in the inquiry context. All proposed modifications to a deposited local plan need to be advertised following the planning authority's consideration of the inspector's report.

Mr. Franks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether local planning authorities are required to make provision for the public to have access to objections to a deposited local plan.

Mr. Tracey: The code of practice makes it clear that copies of objections sent to the planning authority should be placed on deposit along with the plan, so that others may know of them. Copies of the plan will have been deposited for inspection at the planning authority's office and other suitable places. The provisions in the Local Government (Access to Information) Act 1985 would also have to be complied with in so far as they are relevant.

Mr. Franks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discretion the inspector at a local plan public inquiry has to restrict those appearing and giving evidence solely to those who have lodged objections and whose objections have been deemed valid by the programme officer.

Mr. Tracey: Procedures for public local inquiries into local plans are set out in a booklet, "Local Plans: Public local inquiries—a guide to procedure 1984" published by this Department and the Welsh Office. Anyone whose objections are made in writing and submitted by the specified date has the right to appear at the inquiry. People whose objections are not duly made, for example because they are late, do not have a right to appear, but the planning authority may agree to ask the inspector to hear such objections. The inspector may decide whether to hear late objections, whether or not he has been asked to do so by the planning authority.

Mr. Franks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was his role in setting the date for the Cartmel and Furness local plan public inquiry.

Mr. Tracey: The normal practice is for the local planning authority to ask the Planning Inspectorate to provide an inspector to hold an inquiry at a time requested by the authority. Subject to the availability of inspectors, the inspectorate try to meet this request. I understand that in this case the local authority asked for an inquiry in early August and that the date agreed for the inquiry to start is 11 August.

Mr. Franks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discretion a local planning authority has to negotiate with objectors to a deposited local plan to meet their concerns and to seek withdrawal of their objections.

Mr. Tracey: A local planning authority has discretion to negotiate with objectors to a local plan. The code of practice provides that a planning authority may undertake informal discussions with an objector to consider ways in which the plan might be changed to meet his concerns. The code advises

"Any objector who would be satisfied by the changes proposed by the planning authority may be content to submit a statement saying so and not take part in discussion of the objection at the inquiry. However, the objection should not normally be withdrawn at this stage, since it may well still be of assistance to the Inspector."

Mr. Franks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what remedies exist under his Department's code of practice for local plan inquiries for an aggrieved person to challenge the procedures followed by a local planning authority in preparing for and holding a local public inquiry.

Mr. Tracey: In most cases, a pre-inquiry meeting is arranged at which the inspector will discuss the proposed timetable and any queries about the way in which the inquiry is to be conducted. An aggrieved person could make representations then, or at the start of the inquiry. Any aggrieved person who questions the validity of a local plan can apply, on certain grounds, to the High Court to have the plan quashed. This must be within six weeks of the advertisement of the notice to adopt the plan. Any person who considers that he or she has suffered injustice because of maladministration by a local authority in connection with a local plan can ask for the matter to be investigated by the local ombudsman.

Waste Disposal

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what advice his Department gives to local authorities on the treatment and disposal of polychlorinated biphenyl waste.

Mrs. Rumbold: The main source of advice my Department gives to local authorities on the treatment and disposal of PCB waste is Waste Management Paper No. 6, which is due to be extended and updated.

In September 1985 my Department provided local authorities with more up-to-date and definitive guidelines in respect of landfill disposal of PCB-contaminated wastes. This advice is set out in some detail on pages 13 and 14 in the second report of the Hazardous Waste Inspectorate published yesterday. Copies of this report have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many inquiries he has had concerning the disposal problems of polychlorinated biphenyls in the last five years.

Mrs. Rumbold: Over the last five years my Department has received inquiries concerning only some half a dozen incidents which involved the disposal of PCBs.

Homes Insulation Grant Scheme

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what sums were allocated to the English homes insulation grant scheme reserve fund for 1985-86; what proportion of these funds were spent; and what sums have been allocated for the reserve fund for 1986-87.

Sir George Young: The homes insulation scheme reserve in 1985-86 was £7 million; the proportion spent is not yet know. The reserve in 1986-87 is £2·5 million.

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will continue to make available additional moneys to the reserve fund allocated for the English homes insulation grant scheme during the first quarter of 1987.

Sir George Young: The homes insulation scheme reserve for the financial year 1986-87 is £2·5 million.

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will communicate to each local authority his commitment to make available additional moneys to the reserve fund allocated for the English homes insulation grant scheme for 1986-87 Energy Efficiency Year.

Sir George Young: Local authorities have been informed there is a homes insulation scheme reserve of £2·5 million for 1986-87.

Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee (Report)

Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has received the seventh annual report of the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee.

Mr. Waldegrave: Yes. The report is being published today, and copies have been placed in the Library of the House. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I are grateful to the chairman, Professor Paul Matthews, CBE, FRS, and to the committee for their valuable work on this vital subject. We will consider their advice carefully.

Urban Programme

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide a detailed breakdown of the total urban programme for the financial years 1978-79 to 1986-87 (estimated); and if he will list the outturn uroan programme grants paid to each partnership, programme and designated authority and the estimated figure for 1986-87, comparing for each authority the level of funding in each year with (a) housing subsidy receivable and (b) block grant.

Mr. Ridley [pursuant to his reply, 16 July 1986, c. 545]: I have placed a copy of the information in the Library.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Cling Film

Mr. Silvester asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he intends to restrict the use of cling film as a food wrapping material in view of the recent publicity about its safety.

Mrs. Fenner: A working group in my Department is studying plasticisers in all forms of plastic packaging materials. It is due to report on its evaluations next year, but it has noted that some of the plasticiser di-2-ethyhexyladipate (DEHA) used to soften plasticised polyvinyl chloride film (commonly called cling film) will migrate into closely wrapped foodstuffs. None of the levels of DEHA so far found in food give any cause for concern on health grounds, but the work of the group is continuing. There is therefore no reason for me to restrict the use of the film as a food wrapping material. Nevertheless, the results so far do show a markedly higher level of migration when the film is used in cooking in microwave ovens or conventional ovens. I am advised that even this does not indicate the existence of any hazard to human health, but that it does seem to be prudent to avoid such usage if possible. I am therefore proposing to ask manufacturers of this film to ensure that a statement is made on the packaging of the film that it is not suitable for use in cooking. I am also approaching oven manufacturers to advise them to make similar adjustments in their publicity literature.

Bourgoin S A and Others (Court Case)

Mr. Hunter asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether there have been any developments in the case of Bourgoin S A and Others v. the Minister.

Mr. Jopling: A negotiated settlement of this case has been reached. Parliamentary approval for the relevant payment will be sought in a Supplementary Supply Estimate for class IV, vote 5. Pending that approval, this urgent payment of about £3·5 million to cover damages, interest and costs will be met by a repayable advance from the Contingencies Fund.

Dairy Herds (Disease)

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many dairy herds or parts thereof have been purchased by his Department following outbreaks of cornebacterium pyogenes mastitis within the last 12 months; and where these were located.

Mr. Jopling: Part of one dairy herd has been purchased in the last 12 months to try to establish the cause of disease problems on a holding in Kirkby Lonsdale, Cumbria.

Radioactivity

Mr. Corbyn asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the number of occasions and the quantities involved in cases of the mixing of high radioactivity milk with unaffected milk since April.

Mr. Jopling: The results of monitoring since the Chernobyl accident have indicated that radioactivity in milk has always been well below the levels at which the Government would need to consider taking action. I am not aware of any cases involving the mixing of milk containing high levels of radioactivity.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if all food supplies with a higher level of radiation than 350 becquerels have now been withdrawn; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Butter Production

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of the milk held by the Milk Marketing Board was allocated to the production of butter in each of the last five years; and what is the estimate for 1986.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Milk Marketing Board

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what price the Milk Marketing Board receives for supplying milk to dairies and for allocation to butter production, respectively, on a comparative basis.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Pollution (Compensation)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is Her Majesty's Government's policy regarding claims for compensation to United Kingdom farmers from the Government of the polluting country in the case of pollution from a foreign source; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 21 July 1986, c. 1]: The Government believe in the "polluter pays" principle. However, we recognise that individual circumstances will need to be considered in the light of a full assessment of the nature and extent of any damage caused.

Chernobyl Incident

Mr. Kennedy asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he has had with other European Community member states on the question of agricultural compensation arising from the income losses associated with the Chernobyl incident; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 21 July 1986, c. 1]: None to date.

Mr. Kennedy asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he proposes to take, in his capacity as President of the European Community Council of Ministers, to co-ordinate claims on behalf of European Community agriculture against the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics for income loss associated with the Chernobyl incident; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 21 July 1986, c. 2]: I understand that one member state has plans to make assistance available to some farmers whose produce had to be destroyed through radioactive contamination.

Mr. Kennedy asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has as to steps taken by other European Community member states to aid financially the agricultural sectors in those respective states for income losses associated with the Chernobyl incident; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 21 July 1986, c. 2]: I have no plans to co-ordinate any such claims. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has, however, reserved the rights of Her Majesty's Government with the Government of the USSR.

PRIME MINISTER

Sir Peter Marychurch

Q45. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister on what grounds Sir Peter Marychurch, director of Government Communications Headquarters, Cheltenham has had his tenure of office extended; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Sir Peter Marychurch was invited to extend his tenure of office as director of the Government Communications Headquarters in order to provide continuity at a time when a number of retirements are due among senior GCHQ management.

Commercial Whaling

Q65. Dr. Godman asked the Prime Minister if Her Majesty's Government have had any recent discussions with other countries over implementation of the International Whaling Commission's declarations on commercial whaling.

The Prime Minister: At the International Whaling Commission's (IWC) annual meeting, held in Malmo, Sweden from 9 to 13 June this year, the United Kingdom commissioner participated in discussion of matters associated with the implementation of the IWC's decision, taken in 1982, for a moratorium on commercial whaling with effect from the 1985-86 seasons. Three countries, Japan, Norway and the USSR, currently maintain formal objection to this decision under the terms of the convention which governs the IWC, but each has now indicated that it will move towards a cessation of commercial whaling. Japan has formally notified the IWC that it will conditionally withdraw its objection so that all its commercial whaling will cease by April 1988; Norway has announced its intentions to phase out commercial operations by 1988 and the USSR stated last year that it plans to cease Antarctic whaling in 1987.

Granborough, Rugby

Q79. Mr. Pawsey asked the Prime Minister if she has any plans to make an official visit to Granborough, near Rugby.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Engagements

Q154. Mr. Jessel asked the Prime Minister if she will list her engagements for 22 and 23 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell). Tomorrow I shall be attending the wedding of His Royal Highness Prince Andrew to Miss Sarah Ferguson. I shall also be having meetings with ministerial colleagues and others.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 22 July.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 22 July.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty The Queen. Tonight I shall be attending a dinner at the United States embassy in honour of Mrs. Reagan.

Warnock Report

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Prime Minister what representations she has had concerning the report of the Warnock committee on human fertilisation and embryology, Cmnd. 9314; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have received a number of representations, mostly about research involving human embryos. I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison) on 5 June 1986, at column 1082.

EC Budget

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will raise at the next meeting of the European Council the question of the procedure which will require to be adopted to implement section 1.4 of the Fontainebleu European Council conclusions following the agreement on the revised European Economic Community budget; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I see no need for this question to be raised at the next meeting of the European Council.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister why Her Majesty's Government agreed to a revised European Economic Community budget for 1986 which did not conform to the provisions of the 4 December 1984 agreement negotiated in the European Council; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The Government took the view that the abnormally large depreciation of the dollar was an exceptional circumstance which justified some excess over the budget discipline guideline figure for agricultural guarantee expenditure. The Government made clear their profound concern about the increases in non-obligatory expenditure, which in our view could only partly be justified by the enlargement of the Community. The new budget will, however, reduce the United Kingdom's net contribution by some £250 million compared with the Council's Second Reading draft budget, and the United Kingdom's VAT rate will be reduced to 0·68 per cent.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will raise at the next meeting of the European Council the policy of the Council on the making of intergovernmental agreements to balance European Economic Community budgets under article 199 of the treaty in light of the determination by the Court of Auditors in its annual report for 1984; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The Government, in common with the Governments of the other member states, do not accept the Court of Auditors comments about the 1984 intergovernmental agreement. Article 4 of the 1970 own resources decision provided that the Community might finance expenditure from "other revenue" as well as from "own resources" revenue. The same provision has been repeated in article 1 of the own resources decision of 7 May 1985. It would seem therefore the reimbursable advances paid under the 1984 IGA could properly be regarded as "other revenue".

President Mubarak (Meeting)

Mr. Wareing asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on her recent discussions with President Mubarak of Egypt indicating the subjects which were discussed.

The Prime Minister: I had a useful talk with President Mubarak about the Egyptian economy and regional issues.

TRANSPORT

Greater Manchester PTA (Asset Transfers)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport what action he is taking in regard to the greater Manchester passenger transport authority's request to him to amend the asset transfer scheme, under the Transport Act 1985, so as to provide for the retention of the Northenden bus garage and those other bus garages scheduled for closure in areas of high unemployment.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend will be discussing the terms of the transfer scheme with the passenger transport authority and the passenger transport executive. It will be his objective, when approving the scheme, to ensure that the new company has the right asset base to enable it to trade successfully and efficiently.

Drinking and Driving

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport when his Department last consulted senior police officers or magistrates on the problem of drinking and driving.

Mr. Moore: We are in regular contact with the traffic committee of the Association of Chief Police Officers and the road traffic committee of the Magistrates Association to discuss matters of mutual interest, including drinking and driving.

Tolled Estuarial Crossings

Mr. Moate asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to respond to the Transport Committee's report on tolled estuarial crossings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: I have sent to the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Bagier) the Chairman of the Committee, the Government's response to its report.

I regret that the Government have been unable to accept the Select Committee's recommendations that tolls should be abolished on crossings linked to motorways and trunk roads, that we should write off the debts of tolled crossings that are owed to the Exchequer, and that we should discharge over a fixed period the debts owed to private sources. The Government take the view that the debts on the tolled crossings were freely incurred by the authorities concerned. These cannot be written off without financial penalty.

The Government recognise the special financial problems of the Humber bridge: my predecessor acknowledged them in his oral evidence to the Select Committee. My officials are discussing with the Humber Bridge board possible measures to resolve the financial problems of the bridge. In addition, our response to the

Select Committee states that where other crossing authorities consider that they face similar problems, the Government would be willing to consider their financial projections and related proposals for alleviating those problems, provided the authorities have exhausted the possibilities of their own enabling legislation.

Publication of the Government's response is a matter for the Committee.

Passenger Transport Authorities

Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has determined expenditure levels for the passenger transport authorities for 1987-88.

Mr. Moore: I have today notified the authorities of my determinations as follows:

	£ million
Greater Manchester	74·1
Merseyside	67·7
South Yorkshire	45·7
Tyne and Wear	56·6
West Midlands	55·1
West Yorkshire	57·9

Under section 3(4) of the Rates Act 1984 any authority may apply for a redetermination of its expenditure level at a greater amount. I have invited such applications to be submitted by 15 October, and before reaching decisions on them will carefully consider any representations made or information provided.

Redundant Land and Property

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Transport what are the valuation criteria used by his Department for the disposal of redundant land and property in United Kingdom ports, docks and transport undertakings for inner city and urban renewal purposes in cases where the cost of reinstating the land is very high in relation to its likely developed value.

Mr. Moore: The valuation of any land or property disposed of by any port or other transport undertaking is a matter for that undertaking and the purchaser.

ENERGY

Onshore Exploration Licences

Mr. Powley asked the Secretary of State for Energy what arrangements he is making for the award of further onshore exploration licences.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I have today placed in the Libraries of both Houses copies of the text announcing the invitation to apply for landward petroleum licences. The invitation is directed only to those with exploration licences awarded under the previous regulations and I have specified that applications may be made on 30 September 1986 and 7 May 1987. These are the transitional arrangements necessary to give the opportunity to such licensees who wish to apply for the new style exploration licences needed to proceed to the drilling stage. Any wells to be drilled on the new licences will need both the agreement of the landowner and occupier and planning permission.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Magistrates Courts (Crown Prosecutors)

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Attorney-General if he is able to give any figures for the amount of money spent hitherto by Crown prosecutors on the employment of solicitors as agents in the magistrates courts; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The Crown Prosecution Service was introduced into the six former metropolitan counties of Greater Manchester, Merseyside, South Yorkshire, Tyne and Wear, West Midlands and West Yorkshire, and in the counties of Durham and Northumberland, on 1 April 1986. Payments by the Crown Prosecution Service in respect of the engagement of solicitors as agents in the magistrates courts in those areas during the period 1 April to the 11 July was £225,824. This figure does not include outstanding accounts for solicitors engaged during the period quoted which have either not yet been submitted or await payment.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Register of Companies

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) on what date (a) Clyde Buildings and (b) Clydeside Holdings were struck off the companies register at Companies house; for what reason; who were the directors of those companies at that time; and if he will make a statement;

(2) on what date (a) the Elmrace Group and (b) Elmrace Motors were struck off the register of companies at Companies house; for what reason they were struck off; if he will list the directors of the company at that date; and if he will make a statement;

(3) why Gordons Fashions was struck off the register of companies at Companies house; on what date this was done; who were the directors of that company at that time; and if he will make a statement;

(4) why D. Broadhead Ltd. was struck off the register of companies at Companies house on 7 December 1981; who were the directors of the company at that time; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: Elmrace Group Ltd. was struck off the Register of Companies on 27 September 1984, Elmrace Motors Ltd. on 28 September 1984, Gordons Fashions Ltd. on 29 November 1984 and Clydeside Holdings Ltd. on 8 April 1986. The Registrar expects to strike off Clyde Buildings Ltd. on 25 July 1986 and, subject to satisfactory completion of the statutory procedures, he will strike off D. Broadhead Ltd. during August 1986. The latter company has not previously been struck off the register.

Strike off action was initiated for all the companies named because the Registrar had reasons to believe, on the basis of information supplied by the companies themselves, that they were not in business or operating.

The directors of all companies are, or were at the time of strike-off, Mr. A. B. Kiley and K. T. Secretaries Ltd. Additionally, Mrs. S. Miller was a director of Gordons Fashions Ltd. when it was struck off.

Grosvenor Management Services (Scotland) Ltd.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he is satisfied that the accounts of Grosvenor Management Services (Scotland) Ltd. have been lodged in accordance with the requirements of the Companies Acts; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: The accounts of Grosvenor Management Services (Scotland) Ltd. have been filed with the Registrar of Companies for Scotland in accordance with the Companies Act 1985 and are available for inspection at the Companies Registration Office, Edinburgh.

Redundant Steelworkers

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will ensure that there is parity of consideration and support for redundant steelworkers whether these are supported under the arrangements covered by the treaty of Rome or the treaty of Paris.

Mr. Peter Morrison: No. The Government operate a statutory scheme, partly funded by the European Community, for redundant workers who come under the special provisions of the treaty of Pars. The coverage and terms of this scheme have been agreed with the European Commission and are prescribed in regulations.

The British Steel Corporation operates a broadly similar scheme for its redundant workers who do not qualify for benefits under the statutory scheme. The terms of this scheme are a matter for the corporation.

As a rule, private sector steel companies do not operate any schemes for redundant workers who do not qualify for the statutory scheme.

Export Controls

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish in the Official Report the criteria used in deciding whether to permit the export of military and para-military equipment under the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1985.

Mr. Butcher: In considering applications to export military and paramilitary equipment all relevant factors are taken into account, including the type of equipment, its proposed destination and the use to which it might be put.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the countries to which military and paramilitary equipment has been exported under the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1985 to the latest available date.

Mr. Butcher: It has been the practice of successive Governments not to supply details of exports of military and paramilitary equipment. However, total values of exports of defence equipment are contained in table 2.8 of volume II of The Defence Estimates 1986, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the total value of military and paramilitary equipment which has been exported under the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1985 to the latest available date.

Mr. Butcher: An answer could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied with the working of the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: Yes.

Trade Marks (Inquiries)

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much his Department charges inquirers by post or telephone for providing the name and address of the owner of a trade name in a given class of trade marks.

Mr. Pattie: No charge is made for this simple information.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will carry out any investigations to find (a) the form in which trade name information would be most widely acceptable to inquirers throughout the UK; and (b) to evaulate the cost of each of the possible alternative forms of providing access to trade name information held at the Trade Marks Registry, with a view to keeping down the costs to industry and the public; and if he has carried out any similar evaluation in the past.

Mr. Pattie: I do not propose to commission any investigations. The Patent Office is to be hived off from the Civil Service and is charged to conduct its operations in an entrepreneurial fashion and with the needs of its users in mind. It will be for the office to keep under review how best to provide access to its various stores of information, including trade mark information.

Disabled People (Telephones)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress has been made in his consideration of the proposal for a design of modular exchange equipment suitable for hearing-impaired people emanating from the Advisory Committee for Telecommunications for Disabled and Elderly People; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: The proposals submitted through the advisory committee are in outline only. The Royal National Institute for the Deaf is being invited to discuss them in more detail with officials in the Department.

Takeover Bids

Mr. Pollock asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has any plans to seek to amend the law relating to offer documents and their role in hostile takeover bids; whether he has examined the nature and extent of the undertakings given in the original offer documents by Guinness plc for DCL; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: I would refer my hon. Friend in particular to parts IV and V of the Financial Services Bill. I am considering the case to which my hon. Friend refers.

International Tin Council

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what payments Her Majesty's Government have made to the International Tin Council in each of the last three financial years and the current financial year to date; and what are Her Majesty's Government's commitments in respect of the remainder of the financial year.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following payments were made by the United Kingdom during the last three financial years to the International Tin Council:

1983-84	40,036
1984-85	41,030
1985-86	55,701

All the above payments were in respect of the administrative budget. The United Kingdom's share of the 1986-87 administrative budget is £76,117.

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many staff were employed by the International Tin Council in each of the last three financial years and the current financial year to date; and what are the prospective levels of employment for the remainder of the financial year.

Mr. Alan Clark: I am advised by the International Tin Council that the number of staff employed were:

	Number
1983-84	37
1984-85	39
1985-86	39

Current employment is 19.

Textiles (State Aids)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on what date his Department was notified of the official notice 85/C18/05 of the European Community Commission regarding its intention to investigate state funding by the French Government to a major manufacturer of textile, packaging and personal hygiene products; what representations his Department has made in response to that notice, and on what date; and what information he has now received from the Commission on its findings.

Mr. Butcher: The Government were formally notified by the European Commission on 4 January 1985 of the opening of an article 93(2) procedure on the state aid in question. The Government made representations to the Commission on 11 March 1985. The Commission has recently told officials that its investigations are complete and that a decision should be issued in the near future.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received from the British Textile Confederation regarding specific state aids to the textile industry in France and Greece; and what response he has made.

Mr. Butcher: The British Textile Confederation wrote to officials in June about state aids granted to textile manufacturers in France and Greece. In response, officials have made inquiries of the Commission and reported back to the confederation.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give details of the representations which his Department has made to the European Community Commission regarding the allegation that the Greek Government have given subsidies to the textile company Piraiki Patraiki, in breach of European Community rules; and whether he has pressed for a formal notice to be issued under article 93(2) of the treaty to investigate these allegations.

Mr. Butcher: Officials have made inquiries of the Commission regarding allegations that subsidies have been granted. The Commission is seeking information from the Greek Government in order to assess the case for opening an article 93(2) procedure.

Textiles, Clothing and Footwear

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish in the Official Report the official reasons given by the European Community Commission for the rejection of his Department's proposed CLOFT scheme to encourage investment in new manufacturing technology by small firms in the textile, clothing and footwear industries.

Mr. Butcher: The European Commission set out the reasons for its decision on the CLOFT scheme in document C(85) 319 final of 13 February 1985. A copy is available in the Library of the House.

South Africa

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if his Department has circulated companies with new guidelines on the interpretation and application of the EEC code of conduct for companies with interests in South Africa; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Government have today published a White Paper which commends the revised EC code of conduct to British companies with interests in South Africa. Copies will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

The White Paper includes explanatory guidance in confirmation of the informal guidelines which were sent to companies on 20 June as stated by the Prime Minister in her reply for 7 July, at column 7, to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field).

It is now intended for the first time that all EC companies should observe identical procedures and reporting requirements, many of which will already be familiar to United Kingdom companies.

Weights and Measures

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to announce the action he intends to take on the recommendations of the Eden committee on the metrological control of weighing and measuring equipment for use for trade.

Mr. Howard: The Government's response to the Eden committee's recommendations has been published today (Cmnd. 9850). The response sets out the actions the Government propose to take, having carefully considered the committee's report and the many comments received since its publication. Copies of the document have been placed in the Library.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Birkbeck College

Dr. Hampson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give details of the University Grants Committee's additional allocation of funds for Birkbeck college for 1986-87 and the likely reduction in grant for the years up to 1990.

Mr. Walden: The University Grants Committee has allocated an additional £600,000 to the University of London for 1986-87 in respect of students of Birkbeck college. Provisional decisions about grants to all universities for 1987-88, 1988-89 and 1989-90 will be determined in the autumn.

Dr. Hampson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many representations from Birkbeck college he has received over the last four weeks; and if he has any meetings planned to discuss the future of the college.

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend has received over 500 representations about the funding of Birkbeck college. Neither he nor I have any meetings about the college planned at present.

Medical Research Council

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of the Medical Research Council's budget, including administration, was spent in Scotland in 1983-84, 1984-85 and 1985-86.

Mr. Walden: The information requested is as follows:

Financial year	Percentage of the MRC's total expenditure spent in Scotland
1983-84	10·6
1984-85	11·3
1985-86	10·7

University Statistics (Scotland)

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the total number of students attending each Scottish university in the academic year 1984-85; what were the numbers of full-time staff at each university; and what were the staff-student ratios in each case.

Mr. Walden: Information is provided in the following table:

Academic year 1984-85

Scottish universities	Full-time and sandwich students	Part-time students	Full-time equivalent student load (provisional)	Full-time staff paid wholly from university funds (provisional)	Student/staff ratio (provisional)*

Dundee	3,185	128	3,211	333	9·6
Edinburgh	9,798	946	10,406	1,040	10·0
Glasgow	10,084	2,279	10,724	1,017	10·5

Strathclyde	7,502	821	7,631	671	11·4
Total Scottish universities	45,273	5,433	46,708	4,481	10·4

* The staff-student ratio for universities is defined as the full-time equivalent of undergraduate and postgraduate students divided by full-time academic staff funded wholly from university funds.

School Meals

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many children in the county of Buckinghamshire (a) received school meals, (b) took sandwiches and (c) ate out, for each year since 1982.

Mr. Dunn: The annual school meals census for 1982, 1983 and 1984, reports of which are in the Library, show for each local education authority the number of pupils present on the day of the census, the number taking a school meal and the number bringing their own food. It was not possible to collect this information in 1985.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is (a) the cost per meal and (b) the price charged for school meals in Buckinghamshire for each year since 1979.

Mr. Dunn: The price charged for a school meal in each local education authority is shown in the annual census of school meals for the years in question, copies of which are in the Library. Information on the cost per meal in each local education authority is not collected centrally.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is (a) the average cost of providing a school meal and (b) the average staff numbers per 100 meals served for (i) England and (ii) Buckinghamshire.

Mr. Dunn: The Department does not collect the information from which to calculate the average cost of providing a school meal. In the October 1984 school meals census, the only occasion when this information has been collected centrally, 13 LEAs, including Buckinghamshire, did not provide figures for the number of staff per 100 meals served.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will introduce legislation to require local education authorities to provide a school meal service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: No.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many representations have been received by his Department concerning the future of the school meals service in Buckinghamshire.

Mr. Dunn: To date, the Department has received 10 letters from members of the public.

Dovecot Community Comprehensive School, Liverpool

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received calling for more resources to be provided for the Dovecot community comprehensive school in Liverpool; what his response was; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: Neither I nor my right hon. Friend have received any representations about this particular school. The matter is in any case one for Liverpool LEA.

Student Grants

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if the current review of student grants includes the special needs of medical students in their clinical years.

Mr. Walden: The review will cover all aspects of financial support for students studying at first degree or equivalent level.

University Grants

Dr. Hampson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will list grants made available to universities in Great Britain in the financial year 1985-86 on the advice of the University Grants Committee and of the computer board.

Mr. Walden: The information requested is as follows:

Inner London Education Authority

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what expenditure level he proposes to determine for the Inner London education authority in respect of 1987-88.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Under the provisions of the Local Government Act 1985 the Inner London education authority is automatically subject to designation under part I of the Rates Act 1984 for three years from 1 April 1986. For the year beginning 1 April 1987 I have decided to determine an expenditure level of £915 million; this is equal to the expenditure level for the year beginning 1 April 1986 as redetermined and notified to the authority on 13 December 1985. The ILEA has today been notified of this determination.

Lecturers

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will provide figures to show the numbers of (a) part-time and (b) full-time lecturers employed in the public sector in further and higher education for each of the last five years in each local education authority in England and Wales.

Mr. Walden [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1986, c. 356]: The numbers of full-time and part-time (shown as full-time equivalents) lecturers in maintained and assisted establishments in each local authority in England and Wales are as follows:

SCOTLAND

Lothian Region

89. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many young people under the age of 25 years are unemployed in Lothian region.

Mr. Allan Stewart: On 10 April 1986, the latest date for which information is available, there were 17,786 young people under the age of 25 years unemployed and claiming benefit in Lothian region.

Archaeologically Important Sites

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has any plans to appoint an advisory committee to co-ordinate protection of archaelogically important sites which are approved for private and public afforestation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to do so. My right hon. and learned Friend is advised by the Ancient Monuments Board for Scotland on the exercise of his responsibilities under the Ancient Monuments and Archaelogical Areas Act 1979, including the protection of sites of national importance. In addition, as I made clear in the reply to the hon. Member on 18 June, at column 480, Scottish Office and Forestry Commission officials liaise closely on forestry developments which might have implications for archaelogy and on consultation machinery to minimise inadvertent damage to ancient monuments.

Sheep (Radiation)

Sir Adam Butler asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) individual sheep and (b) flocks have had to be destroyed in Scotland as a result of radio-activity from the Chernobyl fallout.

Mr. John MacKay: Apart from animals taken for monitoring purposes, no individual sheep or flocks have been destroyed.

Beef (Intervention Stocks)

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much beef is currently held in cold storage in Scotland by the European Economic Community's intervention board: and at what locations it is held.

Mr. Rifkind: As at 31 May 1986 there were 7,063 tonnes of intervention beef in Scottish cold stores at the following locations.

Aberdeen	Fraserburgh
Bellshill	Glasgow
Bridge of Allan	Glenrothes
Dundee	Inverness
Edinburgh	Peterhead

Dundee

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total number of notified redundancies in the Dundee jobcentre area in 1985; and how many new jobs were created in the city during the year.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Comprehensive information on redundancies and new jobs created is not available. In 1985, 799 redundancies affecting 10 or more workers were notified to the Manpower Services Commission as due to occur in the Dundee jobcentre area. Offers of regional selective assistance made to businesses in Dundee city in 1985 were associated with the creation of some 390 jobs and the safeguarding of a further 2,090 jobs. Approvals of new regional development grant were associated with the creation of 850 jobs, although some projects may have received both forms of assistance. Many jobs are also created without such assistance.

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the change in (a) manufacturing output and (b) productivity in Scotland in 1985 compared with 1984; and how the figures compare with the figures for the United Kingdom as a whole.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Manfacturing output increased by 4·2 per cent. in Scotland in 1985 and productivity by 4·8 per cent. Broadly comparable figures for the United Kingdom are 3·1 per cent. and 2·8 per cent. respectively (exact comparison is not possible since the Scottish output index is not adjusted for stock change, whereas the United Kingdom index is, and the Scottish figure for productivity does not take account of the self-employed, whereas the United Kingdom figure does).

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

International Institutions and Organisations

Mr. Normanton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report a list of the international institutions and organisations of which the United Kingdom is a member; and if he will indicate, in each case, what are the actual annual costs of membership paid or incurred out of public funds.

Mr. Eggar: A list of international organisations for which the Foreign and Commonwealth Office is responsible and the costs of membership for 1986-87 were published in class II, vote 2, sections A and B and class II, vote 5, section A of the Supply Estimates. The estimated costs of membership of the European Communities is to be found in the public expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9702-II) at part 3.3. The costs of membership of other international organisations for 1986-87 will be found in the appropriate Supply Estimates, copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

Voting Rights

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to publicise the new rights to vote given to British citizens abroad in the Representation of the People Act 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: In addition to various articles, interviews and press notices, arrangements have been made to advertise the terms of the Representation of the People Act 1985 in certain British publications with a wide readership overseas and also in leading newspapers in countries with the largest British expatriate communities. A number of major multinational employers have agreed to inform their overseas staff. Diplomatic posts and consulates are arranging widespread publicity both about the new voting rights and local arrangement for registration. This includes advertisements in the local press, the placing of press notices, informing British clubs and orgainsations and, where practical, writing to all Britons on consular registration lists.

Drug Liaison Officers

Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in posting drug liaison officers in Bombay and Delhi.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend informed the House on 11 June that the Government of India had agreed in principle to the posting of drug liaison officers. This reflected assurances in a letter from the Indian high commissioner to me dated 3 June, which also said that the modalities of the posting and the parameters of work for the officers should be worked out between the two Governments. Our acting high commissioner in New Delhi obtained oral confirmation from the Indian Ministry of External Affairs shortly afterwards that no questions relating to the modalities or parameters of the officers' postings were outstanding. Visas were issued for two officers on 12 June. On 24 June we heard from the Indian high commission that the designated officers should not take up their postings without written consent, pending the resolution of certain commercial matters unrelated to drugs co-operation.

We regret the fact that obstacles have been placed in the way of these postings. We are pursuing this matter vigorously in the hope of an early and satisfactory solution. We remain committed to close international co-operation, which is the only way to defeat drug traffickers. We have accordingly made plain to the Indian Government at the highest level our hope that this issue, which ought not to be a matter of difficulty between us, can be speedily resolved in our mutual interest.

NATIONAL FINANCE

714 Certificates

90. Mr. Thurnham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to change the current procedure for issuing 714 certificates in respect of the electrical contracting industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: There are no plans to change the current procedure for issuing 714 certificates.

Treasury Advisory Group (Report)

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects to publish the Treasury Advisory Group's report on accounting for economic costs and changing prices.

Mr. MacGregor: The advisory group's report will be published shortly by HMSO. I will arrange for copies to be placed in the Library on publication. No decisions have been taken on the extent to which the report's recommendations should be implemented.

Cash Limits

Mr. Maples asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give revised cash limits for 1986-87 resulting from the carry forward of capital underspends allowed under the end-year flexibility scheme for central Government and for local authority expenditure.

Mr. MacGregor: A list of revised cash limits is shown in the table. The increases in cash limits on central Government votes are subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimates.

The total increase classified as public expenditure is £303,227,000. This sum will be met from the Reserve and will therefore not add to the public expenditure planning total.

Private Pensions

Mr. Stern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of changes in private pension provision as a result of proposals in the Finance Bill.

Mr. Norman Lamont: This will depend on how the trustees of over-funded schemes decide to deal with excessive surpluses. It is too early to judge to what extent trustees will seek to deal with excessive surpluses by improving benefits, rather than reducing contributions or making a payment to the employer.

Correspondence (Welsh Language)

Mr. Wigley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the policy of his Department when letters are sent in Welsh to offices in Wales of the Inspectorate of Taxes as to the sending of replies in Welsh.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Inland Revenue's policy is that Her Majesty's Inspectors of Taxes in Wales will write in Welsh in reply to letters written in that language.

Public Expenditure

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a comparison of the subventions provided by the United Kingdom as a whole to its various regions, including Northern Ireland, showing, in the latter case, security expenditure separately.

Mr. MacGregor: It is only possible to identify the subvention from the United Kingdom in the case of Northern Ireland, which has a separate Consolidated Fund. Details of that subvention for 1985-86 were given in the House of Lords by my noble friend Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, Lord Lyell on 30 June at column 742. It includes expenditure of £43·7 million by the Northern Ireland Office, mainly on security. There is also the extra cost of the Army's task which, as shown in that reply, is £135 million.

Income Tax

Mr. Clay asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the cost of each £100 increase in the basic personal allowances if the wife's earned income relief and the married man's allowance were both replaced by a single non-transferable tax allowance.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1986, c. 436]: About £750 million in a full year at 1986-87 prices.

Gross Domestic Product

Mr. Wilson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give figures for the financial years 1983-84, 1984-85, and 1985-86 to show the gross domestic product of the United Kingdom continental shelf region.

Mr. MacGregor [pursuant to his reply, 21 July 1986]: The estimates in current prices of the gross domestic product of United Kingdom continental shelf region are:

	£ billion
1983-84	17·0
1984-85	20·6
1985-86	16·5

HOME DEPARTMENT

Deportations

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons were recommended for deportation with no custodial sentence during 1985; and in how many such cases the courts directed release (a) subject to conditions and (b) without conditions.

Mr. Waddington: Three hundred and sixty two, of whom 78 were released subject to conditions and 154 were released unconditionally.

Immigration

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the cost per day of detaining a person under Immigration Act powers in (a) prison department establishments and (b) immigration service detention accommodation.

Mr. Waddington: The total cost per day of detaining a person under Immigration Act powers in Prison Department establishments is estimated at £34. The cost of immigration service detention centres is estimated at £115. Immigration detention centres are fairly small and for a variety of reasons they cannot reasonably be operated below certain minimum levels of staffing. We are therefore unable to achieve the same economies of scale as in Prison Department establishments.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether he has decided in what form he will publish extended information on the number of persons detained under Immigration Act powers, as announced in the reply to the hon. Member for Hammersmith on 23 July 1985, Official Report, column 466;

(2) whether he has decided in what form he will publish extended information on the number of persons detained under Immigration Act powers.

Mr. Waddington: Information is held centrally on the number of passengers, by nationality, seeking entry at ports and detained overnight in approved detention accommodation and is available on request. No decision has been taken about regular publication pending resolution of difficulties which have been encountered in extending this information to cover all those held in detention under Immigration Act powers, irrespective of the length of detention.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to make a decision on whether Mr. Olorunfemi's children (HO Ref. No. 0108282/3(S)) will be permitted to join him in the United Kingdom; and how long this case has been outstanding.

Mr. Waddington: I wrote to the hon. Member yesterday informing him of my decision on the case. The application form was originally submitted on 19 May 1985. Since then arrangements have had to be made to interview the eldest applicant in Lagos and Mr. and Mrs. Olorunfemi in the United Kingdom, and for documents provided by Mr. Olorunfemi at his interview to be verified in Lagos.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many passengers were refused leave to enter the United Kingdom as visitors in the last 12 months for which figures are available; how many of these were granted temporary admission pending hon. Members' representations; in how many cases the immigration officers' decision to refuse leave to enter was overturned by a Minister; and in how many cases the passenger made a voluntary departure prior to the Minister's decision.

Mr. Waddington: Information is not available in the form requested, but the following gives such relevant information as can be readily supplied. Between April 1985 and March 1986, the latest date for which such figures are currently available, 20,374 passengers were removed from the United Kingdom after having been refused leave to enter; it is not possible to say how many of them were seeking entry as visitors. During the same period temporary admission was granted to passengers on 8,543 occasions following refusal of leave to enter and on 8,402 occasions pending further examination; it is not known how many of these were subject to hon. Members' representations. Also, refusal of leave to enter was withdrawn on 685 occasions although it is not known how many of these were as a result of a decision by a Minister. A total of 5,700 representations in port cases were received from hon. Members in 1985 and a further 1,850 in the first four months of 1986.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to increase the numbers of bilingual staff at ports of entry.

Mr. Waddington: The immigration service arranges full-time language training courses for immigration officers for six months each year. The choice of languages depends on the priority needs of the major ports and the availability of suitable courses and tutors. Arrangements are currently being made for courses in two languages of the Indian subcontinent for around 20 officers next winter.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he intends to take to investigate allegations of investigation harassment by immigration officers at ports of entry.

Mr. Waddington: All complaints against the way the immigration control operates, including any of harassment by immigration officers, are thoroughly investigated and action taken if necessary. Where complaints are justified supervisory action is always taken and disciplinary action may follow.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will investigate the reasons for the upward trend in the number of visitors to Britain refused entry in the first six months of 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: I shall reply later this week.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to ensure that immigration officers adhere to departmental guidelines when dealing with visitors to the United Kingdom from Pakistan, India and the Caribbean.

Mr. Waddington: Immigration officers are required to adhere to the immigration rules and to departmental instructions in respect of all arriving and departing passengers. I have no evidence to suggest that they are not doing so, but any failure to comply with these requirements which is brought to the notice of the Department will be thoroughly investigated and if the criticism is justified action will be taken.

Sunday Trading

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions have taken place since 1 April for breaches of Sunday trading laws.

Mr. Waddington: I regret that this information is not yet available centrally.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he proposes to monitor the enforcement of the existing Sunday trading laws.

Mr. Waddington: The enforcement of the existing law is a matter for local authorities. Statistics of prosecutions will be collected in the normal way.

Parole Statistics

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of those who have been released on parole were recalled to prison in 1970, 1975, 1980 and 1985.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is published annually in "The Report of the Parole Board" (table 4, appendix 4 of the latest issue for 1985, House of Commons Paper No. 428) and is given in the following table. The increases reflect the extensions of the use of parole in August 1975 under section 35 of the Criminal Justice Act 1972 and in July 1984 under section 33 of the Criminal Justice Act 1982.

Offenders recalled from parole from determinate sentences

	Number
1970	138
1975	311
1980	445
1985	803

Prison Population

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total prison population in England and Wales at the present time.

Mr. Mellor: On 30 June 1986, about 46,600 persons were held in Prison Department establishments in England and Wales.

Life Sentences

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average number of years served in the case of life prison sentences.

Mr. Mellor: I would refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) on 3 December, at column 163. More detailed information on the time served under sentence by those received under sentence for life in the years 1965 to 1985 will be included in chapter 4 of "Prison Statistics, England and Wales 1985", which will be published later in the year.

Public Houses (Assaults on Staff)

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take steps to increase the maximum penalties available to the courts for assaults upon licensees or staff.

Mr. Mellor: The maximum penalties available to the courts for assault, including life imprisonment for causing grievous bodily harm, seem already adequate.

Criminal Injuries Compensation Board

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of staff in the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board, dealing with applicants for the criminal injuries award, for each of the years from 1978-79 to 1985-86.

Mr. Mellor: The number of staff in post at the board on 1 April of each year from 1978 to 1985 was as follows (part-time staff being each counted as one-half):

Date	Staff in post
1 April 1978	126
1 April 1979	132·5
1 April 1980	156·5
1 April 1981	155
1 April 1982	163
1 April 1983	163
1 April 1984	182
1 April 1985	189

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of applications to the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board in each year from 197879 to 1985-86.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested was published in respect of the financial years 1978-79 to 1984-85 in the 17th and 21st reports of the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board (Cmnd. 8401 and Cmnd. 9684). The provisional figure for applications to the board in 1985-86 is about 39,700.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how much money was set aside for compensation in the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board in each year from 1978-79 to 1985-86.

(2) how much money was set aside for administration in the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board in each year from 1978-79 to 1985-86.

Mr. Mellor: The amounts included in Budget estimates and supplementary estimates for grant-in-aid to the board were:

Financial year	Compensation £	Administration £
1978-79	13,761,000	1,674,000
1979-80	20,691,000	2,234,000
1980-81	27,244,000	3,000,000
1981-82	23,400,000	3,662,000
1982-83	29,000,000	3,689,000
1983-84	33,000,000	3,955,000
1984-85	38,000,000	4,747,000
1985-86	41,497,000	5,000,000

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of applications which have been unresolved by the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board after (a) one year, (b) five years and (c) over five years.

Mr. Mellor: The precise information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. As stated in the most recent annual report of the board (Cmnd. 9684, paragraph 5), three quarters of the cases resolved in the financial year 1984-85 were resolved within a year of receipt.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average length of time for compensation claims to be fully assessed in the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board in each year from 1978-79 to 1985-86.

Mr. Mellor: Information is not available about the average length of time taken to deal with applications.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of applications dealing with assaults on public transport staff to the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board in each year from 1978-79 to 1985-86.

Mr. Mellor: Statistics are no longer kept on the categories of applicants to the board. The latest available figures are for 1978-79 and 1979-80. In these years, 455 and 421 applications respectively were made to the board in respect of assaults on public transport staff in the course of their duties.

Metropolitan Police Vehicles

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the operational mileage of Metropolitan police vehicles in (a) 1984 and (b) 1985.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The total mileage of all Metropolitan police vehicles during 1984 was 53,944,007 miles, and in 1985 it was 51,240,324 miles.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers and how many members of the public were killed in accidents involving Metropolitan police force vehicles in (a) 1984 and (b) 1985.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The number of police officers and other members of the public killed in accidents involving Metropolitan police force vehicles in 1984 and 1985 is as follows:

	1984	1985
Metropolitan police officers	2	0
Other members of the public	3	7
TOTAL	5	7

Special Constables

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will consider some form of remuneration for special constables.

Mr. Giles Shaw: All special constables receive out-of-pocket expenses. The possibility of paying in addition some form of bounty is kept under regular review, but there is no satisfactory evidence that such a payment would make it easier to recruit and retain special constables.

Asylum

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to make a decision on the granting of asylum for (a) Mr. Mohammed Hussein Abi (HO Ref.: M5 16237) and (b) Mr. Mohammed Saeed Ahmed (HO Ref.: M5 16400); and for how long these cases have been outstanding.

Mr. Waddington: I wrote to the hon. Member yesterday giving my decisions. The applications for asylum were made in December 1984 and January 1985 respectively. I regret the delay in these cases.

Television Licence Fees (Hotels)

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to change the present arrangements for the number of television licence fees payable by hotels.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No.

Police National Computer

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many names have been removed from the police national computer under the new criteria for the recording of such names announced in March 1986.

Mr. Giles Shaw: All records which have been considered for weeding under the old criteria are being re-examined in the light of the criteria announced in March 1986. As of 30 June 1986, 8,147 names had been removed from the police national computer by this process.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what security safeguards exist for the procedures introduced to identify the originator of an inquiry to the police national computer; and what are the categories used to record the reasons for the inquiry.

Mr. Giles Shaw: It is the responsibility of individual chief officers to determine the procedures used in their forces to identify the originator of an inquiry to the police national computer and the categories used to record the reasons for an inquiry. Information is not held centrally as to the practices adopted in relation to these matters in each force.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has anything to add to his answer of 9 July, Official Report, column 184, as regards the current number of entries on the criminal names index of the police national computer.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I regret that the answer of 9 July, Official Report, column 184 contained an error with regard to the current number of entries on the criminal names index of the police national computer. Index 6 should have read:

	Number of Accesses	Maximum Number of Entries	Minimum Number of Entries	Current Number of Entries
6. Criminal Names	1,108,803	5,119,354	4,977,206	5,119,354

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the status of the fingerprints scene of crime category on the police national computer.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The fingerprint scene of crime mark searching application on the police national computer offers the police service the facility of comparing a fingerprint "mark" taken from a crime scene against a national database of fingerprint records. The service is currently available through 11 access points, but the PNC board is shortly to consider a proposal that all force fingerprint bureaux should have direct access to it.

Metropolitan Police (Rewards)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions in the past 12 months a complaint that a reward has been improperly offered or paid has been recorded by the Metropolitan police; and how many (a) prosecutions and (b) convictions have resulted.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner that in the past 12 months there have been no such complaints, prosecutions or convictions.

Metropolitan Police (Social Functions)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many social functions organised by (i) the Conservative party, (ii) the Labour party and (iii) the Social Democratic and Liberal parties Metropolitan police force representatives have attended in an official capacity in each of the last three years.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that this information is not available.

Crime (Clear-up Statistics)

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he has any proposals for the introduction of a code of practice for the preparation of crime clear-up statistics in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he has any proposals for the introduction of formal guidelines on the basis of preparation of crime clear-up statistics in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The Home Office has issued guidelines on the preparation of clear-up statistics, which specify the criteria by which an offence is recorded as cleared up. These are given on page 7 of the manual on Home Office requirements "Criminal Statistics Volume IV, Annual and Miscellaneous Returns", a copy of which is available in the Library. Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary collects information on the number of offences cleared up in various ways by each force and from 1985 the Home Office has introduced a more detailed return designed to collect additional information, the publication of which will be considered in due course. The allocation of police resources to different ways of clearing up offences is an operational matter for chief officers to decide.

Racial Attacks

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide figures for the number of reported racial attacks in London, broken down by police division, for 1985 and 1986 to date.

Mr. Mellor: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Kevin Taylor

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Greater Manchester as to the anticipated date of completion of inquiries into Mr. Kevin Taylor, and as to the current state of the investigation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the chief constable of Greater Manchester that the investigation into the affairs of Mr. Kevin Taylor is continuing; it is being conducted as quickly as possible, but the chief constable cannot estimate when it will be completed.

Housing Estates (Riot Risk)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library a summary of the report on the London housing estates with a high risk of riot, compiled by A8 branch of the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No. Police assessments prepared for operational purposes are not normally published.

Alcohol (Young Persons)

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when was the last occasion on which his Department talked with either senior police officers or magistrates on the problems of under-age drinking;

(2) what further steps his Department intends taking to enforce the laws regarding under-age drinking and the sale of alcohol to young people.

Mr. Mellor: Enforcement of the law relating to the sale of alcohol to, and purchase and consumption of alcohol by, young people on licensed premises is a matter for the police. Recent discussions with the police or magistrates have not focused specifically on the problems of under-age drinking, but if the hon. Member has a particular point in mind I will be glad to consider it.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions for selling alcohol to those under-age were initiated in 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984, 1985 and 1986.

Mr. Mellor: The available information is given in the following table. Corresponding information for 1985 and 1986 is not yet available.

Persons proceeded against in magistrates courts in England and Wales for selling intoxicating liquor to persons under 18

Year	Number of persons proceeded against
1980	439
1981	410
1982	323
1983	307
1984	314

Dangerous Substances

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many accidents involving polychlorinated bi-phenyl substances were notified to his Department by the police or fire brigades in the last five years.

Mr. Giles Shaw: During 1984 and 1985 three incidents were attended by local authority fire brigades in England and Wales in which these substances were specified as involved in the brigades' reports. Corresponding information for 1981-83 could be made available only at disproportionate cost. There is no requirement on police forces to notify such incidents to the Department.

Police (Expenditure)

Mr. Lightbown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of police expenditure he proposes should be met by central Government through police grant in 1987-88.

Mr. Hurd: I propose that the rate of police grant should remain at 51 per cent. for 1987-88 and, for future years, subject to decisions on the rate support grant settlement in those years. I believe that police grant should continue at this level in order to ensure that the police service has the resources it needs to cope with the increasing demands placed upon it. As part of the consultations on the 1987-88 rate support grant settlement the views of the relevant local authority associations will be sought on my proposal.

Civil Defence

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will give an assessment of local authorities' civil defence preparedness; and if he will make a further statement on the planned programme for the implementation of the Civil Defence (General Local Authority Functions) Regulations 1983.

Mr. Giles Shaw: A number of local authorities are making encouraging progress in meeting their civil defence responsibilities, but the rate of progress varies considerably and there is a great deal still to be done before there is a satisfactory and balanced state of preparedness across the country. I therefore propose to require local authorities to pursue a rolling three-year programme setting priorities and a timetable for implementation of the 1983 regulations. The programme emphasises the central importance of detailed operational civil defence plans. It sets six-monthly target dates for their staged completion in all counties within two to three years. New guidance on the preparation of plans and on the all hazards approach will also be issued to accompany the programme.

I have placed in the Library copies of a report on the present state of local authority civil defence preparedness; the proposed three-year planned programme for implementation of the 1983 regulations; and drafts of the new guidance.

In the context of the programme, and as part of the discussion of civil defence grant estimates, my Department will review progress annually with individual authorities and agree detailed objectives for the following year. Officials are writing today to the local authority associations seeking comments, and I intend that the final programme should be issued to local authorities in October.

The Government intend that all local authorities shall carry out their statutory civil defence responsibilities, and I hope the programme will be recognised as a constructive and necessary focus for this vital work. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland is making broadly similar arrangements in Scotland.

Passports (Proof of Identity)

Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans to change the requirements for documentary proof of identity which must be produced with applications for a British visitor's passport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: At present, only one document from a prescribed list need be produced as evidence of identity. But there have been instances in which British visitor's passports have been obtained by people not entitled by identity or nationality to use them. I have therefore decided to introduce changes in the documents that applicants for the British visitor's passport have to produce. As from September of this year, save where someone can produce an expired uncancelled standard British passport all applicants will be required to produce one document from each of two groups. The groups of documents, which will, of course, be listed on the application form for the British visitor's passport are as follows:

A. a birth certificate or adoption certificate showing full names issued in the United Kingdom or abroad by a United Kingdom authority an uncancelled British visitor's passport in present name (or husband's/wife's if included on it) a certificate of naturalisation or registration as a British citizen/British Dependent Territories citizen/British Overseas citizen/citizen of the United Kingdom and Colonies showing full names a British passport or British visitor's passport on which previously included as a child a retirement pension book or pension card in present name

B. Identifying documents such as: a National Health Service medical card in your present name a driving licence a valid bank cheque card, Eurocheque card, girobank card, credit card, bus or rail card a recent gas, telephone or electricity bill a child benefit book showing present name and including any children to be included on the passport.

I believe that this change will reduce, though it cannot entirely prevent, the opportunity for abuse of the passport, while causing only minimum inconvenience to members of the public.

Central Drug Squad

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the central drug squad was established; what was its original establishment size and what has been the central establishment of both civilian and uniformed personnel each year since its creation.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1986, c. 336]: The central drug squad was formed in January 1978 with an establishment of 37 police officers and five civil staff. The police establishment rose to 38 during 1981; and last year the establishment was increased to 57 police officers and six civil staff.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide a breakdown by rank of the officers in the central drug squad, the national drugs intelligence unit and the divisional drugs squad.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1986, c. 336]: The strengths of the central drug squad and the national drugs intelligence unit on 16 July were 57 and 39 respectively. The Commissioner considers that to give a breakdown by rank of their strength could compromise their operational effectiveness.

For divisional drugs squads the breakdown by rank as at 16 July 1986 was as follows:

	Number
Detective inspector	3
Detective sergeant	14
Police sergeant	5
Detective constable	24
Police constable	35
TOTAL	81

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many drugs raids were carried out by the district-divisional drugs squads in each year since 1979;

(2) for the most convenient recent period, what was the percentage of referrals for investigation of drug offences emanating from (a) the police, (b) the public and (c) other agencies and institutions in the Metropolitan police area;

(3) if he will estimate the number of Metropolitan police working hours spent on drugs-related investigations in the past 12 months;

(4) if he will estimate the number of Metropolitan police officers involved in drug raids during the past 12 months.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his replies, 14 July 1986, c. 336]: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis has informed me that this information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many drugs raids were completed by the central drug squad in each year since 1979.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1986, c. 336]: Figures for the number of premises searched by officers of the central drug squad are available only from 1982 and are as follows:

	Number
1982	108
1983	278
1984	172
1985	268
*1986	195

* to 30 June.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will detail the number of prosecutions in respect of offences relating to each listed and prohibited drug within the Metropolitan police district for each of the past five years.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1986, c. 336]: The information requested for the years 1980 to 1984 is given in the table. Corresponding information for 1985 is not yet available.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many black and Asian personnel are employed in the central, national intelligence and divisional drug squads.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1986, c. 336]: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that there are no ethnic minority police officers or civil staff assigned to the central drug squad or divisional drug squads at the moment. Two police officers and three civil staff attached to the national drugs intelligence unit are from ethnic minorities.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many weeks' training are given to officers in (a) the central drug squad, (b) the national drugs intelligence unit and (c) the divisional drugs squads.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1986, c. 336]: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that all recruit and probationer training programmes cover drugs and that further drugs training is given to detectives. Officers joining the central drug squad undergo an intensive one-week induction course; a similar course is provided for officers posted to the national drugs intelligence unit, followed by three weeks of intelligence analysis and computer training. No additional training is provided for divisional drugs squad officers.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total amount of (a) cannabis, (b) heroin, (c) cocaine and (d) LSD, seized by police officers in the Metropolitan police area for each of the past five years.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1986, c. 336]: The information for the years 1980 to 1984 is given in the table. Corresponding information for 1985 is not yet available.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what personnel are employed by the Metropolitan police on maintaining liaison between the drugs squads and Customs and Excise officers.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1986, c. 337]: No officers are deployed by the Commissioner to act solely in an operational liaison capacity with Her Majesty's Customs and Excise. There is, however, continuing close liaison: drugs squads officers work in close co-operation with Customs officers where operational needs so require; and central drug squad officers visit Her Majesty's Customs and Excise as part of their induction course. The national drugs intelligence unit, which is staffed by officers from the Metropolitan police, provincial forces and Her Majesty's Customs and Excise, acts as a point of liaison between police forces and Her Majesty's Customs and Excise, in addition to its intelligence functions.

Dr. Skuse

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) on 26 June, Official Report, column 279, if he will say whether, during his Department's review of cases in which Dr. Skuse gave evidence, anything emerged to suggest that Dr. Skuse's evidence was not reliable.

Mr. Hurd [pursuant to his reply, 7 July 1986, c. 57]: The Department reviewed the written evidence given by Dr. Skuse in a number of cases. Nothing emerged to suggest that the evidence was unreliable. So far as the case of the Birmingham bombings is concerned, all the forensic evidence given at the trial is still under review in the context of representations about the case, in particular about the reliability of the forensic test used.

DEFENCE

Spitfires (RAF Biggin Hill)

Mr. John Hunt asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will arrange for an inspection of the condition of the two Spitfire aircraft at the gates of RAF Biggin Hill, with a view to sanctioning any necessary repairs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: These aircraft were inspected about a year ago and we are aware of their condition. An internal review is being undertaken of the maintenance programme needed for gate guardian aircraft and how such a programme should be financed.

Bomb Incident, Lincolnshire

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the circumstances surrounding the dropping of a practice bomb in a field near Friskney, Lincolnshire, on 11 July.

Mr. Freeman: I shall answer this question shortly.

RAF Bentwaters

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence if any change is proposed in the use by the United States air force of RAF Bentwaters: and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: No change is proposed in the planned use of RAF Bentwaters.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the implications of the new system of storage of nuclear weapons proposed for RAF Bentwaters for the verification of present and future arms control agreements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: The possible storage facilities under discussion with the United States Government have no implications for the verification provisions of current arms control agreements. Whether there are any implications for future agreements would depend on the ambit of those agreements.

Porton Down (Animal Experiments)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) dogs and (b) rhesus monkeys have been used for testing for the effects of nerve gas at Porton Down over the most recent period of 12 months for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: It is not our practice to make available detailed information on the usage of particular species in animal experiments at the chemical defence establishment Porton Down, as to do so could in many cases enable an informed observer to gain a useful insight into the scope and direction of CDE's work to the detriment of national security.

The total number of experiments subject to the Cruelty to Animals Act 1876 carried out at CDE in 1985 was 6,600, a decrease of 4,300 on 1984. The vast majority of these experiments involved mice, rats and guinea pigs.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence why LD-50 tests are considered necessary for nerve gas experiments on dogs and rhesus monkeys at Porton Down; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Animal experiments involving nerve agents that might be used against our service men are intended to determine the toxicity of those agents and to assess the efficiency and safety of possible antidotes. Formal LD-50 tests are not conducted on rhesus monkeys or dogs for this purpose. In order to minimise the use of animals an estimate of lethal toxicity is derived from tests on as small a number of rhesus monkeys as possible.

Military Base, Caerwent (Protest)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether, during the protest at the military base at Caerwent on 5 July, military police operated outside the base on land owned by Monmouth district council.

Mr. Freeman: No.

United States Army Vehicles

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence under what circumstances United States army vehicles are driven outside the perimeter of the establishments at which they are usually used.

Mr. Freeman: No special restrictions apply to United States army vehicles. They are subject to British law in the same way as vehicles of the British armed forces.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the driver of the United States air force vehicle used to carry civilians to the police station at Caerwent on 5 July held a British driving licence.

Mr. Freeman: The eight protestors arrested at RAF Caerwent on 5 July were transported in a United States army vehicle driven by an officer of the Ministry of defence police to a point within the base in order to be charged. The driver held a British driving licence.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence why a United States army vehicle was used to convey arrested protestors to the police station at Caerwent on 5 July.

Mr. Freeman: Where Ministry of Defence police are stationed at a base used by United States forces in this country provision of transport for them is the responsibility of the United States forces.

Strategic Defence Initiative

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy of 11 July, Official Report, columns 303-5 those companies and academic institutions in Wales which have expressed an indication to seek United States-funded work in the strategic defence initiative research programme.

Mr. Lee: No. It is for the companies and academic institutions to decide themselves whether and at what stage to make their expressions of interest known in public.

Recruitment (Scotland)

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many persons were recruited in Scotland for each of the armed services in 1985-86; and if he will break down the figure by careers office areas.

Mr. Freeman: The numbers of service personnel recruited at careers information offices in Scotland between 1 April 1985 and 31 March 1986 are set out in the following table. The figures exclude the recruitment of officers and Queen Alexandra's Royal Naval Nursing Service who are recruited centrally.

CIO	RN/RM	Army	RAF	All Services
Aberdeen	40	134	88	262
Dundee	47	444	125	616

Total	389	2,418	520	3,327

* Attestations of entrants to the RAF from the Inverness CIO were made at Aberdeen and are included in the Aberdeen numbers.

Winston Barracks, Lanark

Dame Judith Hart asked the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to the answer of 14 July, Official Report, column 428, if he is in negotiation with the United States armed services concerning the future of Winston barracks, Lanark.

Mr. Freeman: As I said in the answer I gave to the right hon. Lady on Monday 14 July, at column 428, the future of the barracks is still being considered. Until decisions are taken it would be inappropriate to give details of any interested parties.

Forces (Land and Establishments)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the establishment of, and land owned by, or leased by, or in which an interest is held by (a) the Territorial Army, (b) the Home Service Force, (c) the Royal Observer Corps, (d) recruitment offices of the armed forces and (e) the cadet forces in Wales.

Mr. Freeman: I shall answer this question shortly.

EMPLOYMENT

British Tourist Authority

12. Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the present funding levels of the British Tourist Authority.

Mr. Trippier: The British Tourist Authority received Government funding of £20·3 million in 1986-87. This was an increase of £3·2 million (20 per cent.) over the 1985-86 level.

Community Programme

13. Dr. M. S. Miller asked the Paymaster General what is the current average allowance paid on the community programme; and if he has any plans to increase it in line with the retail prices index.

Mr. Lang: Community programme participants are paid wages which reflect the local rate for the job and managing agents and sponsors of projects are reimbursed for wage costs up to a maximum average of £67 per participant per week. This was raised from £63 on 1 April 1986 and is kept under review.

28. Mr. Weetch asked the Paymaster General what proportion of community programme participants now obtain a job on leaving the programme.

Mr. Lang: The results of the latest survey of former community programme participants (in autumn 1985), show that 54 per cent. of those responding had had at least one job within 10 months of leaving and that 28 per cent. obtained a job immediately on leaving.

85. Dr. Godman asked the Paymaster General what percentage of community programme workers are employed full-time.

Mr. Lang: At 30 June 1986, the latest date for which statistics are available, 25 per cent. of those working on the community programme were employed full time.

Adult Training

14. Mr. Corbett asked the Paymaster General what plans he has to seek to increase the spending of industry on adult training.

Mr. Trippier: The primary aim of the adult training strategy is to convince employers that increased investment in the training and development of the nation's work force is vital to business success.

The Government, through the Manpower Services Commission are pursuing this strategy through a range of measures, which include both direct provision of training and measures to encourage and help employers to undertake more training.

42. Mr. Sheerman asked the Paymaster General when he intends to review the Government's strategy of funding adult training.

Mr. Trippier: The White Paper "Training for Jobs" sets out the Government's conclusions on the funding of education and training generally and the roles and responsibilities of the different parties involved. Within this framework the Government accepted in April 1986 the plan of work for a major study by the Manpower Services Commission of the funding of vocational education and training, including adult training.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General if he will list each adult retraining scheme, the numbers on it, projected numbers for 1987, 1988 and 1989, and the most recent estimate of the cost per place.

Mr. Trippier [pursuant to his reply, 21 July 1986]: The following table provides the forecast number of starts and expenditure for each adult training scheme for 1986-87. Information is not available by calendar year because our training schemes are administered and funded on a financial year basis. Plans for future financial years will be announced in due course.

Planned numbers of people to be helped under adult training programmes 1986

Adult training programmes	1986-87 Forecast number of starts	1986-87 Forecast expenditure £ million

Training for enterprise	46,300	18·8

Adult training programmes	1986-87 Forecast number of starts	1986-87 Forecast expenditure £ million

Residential training for disabled	1,100	6·1
Wider opportunities training programme	44,700	26·0
Open Tech (open learning)	50,000	10·9

Note:
Because of widely different course lengths it is not possible to calculate a meaningful average cost per trainee for the individual schemes.

High-tech Training

15. Mr. Rathbone asked the Paymaster General what plans he has to increase the availability of high-tech training and re-training required for modern manufacturing jobs.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Through a series of promotional initiatives the Government are encouraging employers to recognise the importance of investment in training and retraining for improving the skills of their work force at all levels. The Government are also making a direct contribution to meeting industry's current and future skill needs through their training provision for employed and unemployed young people and adults.

Skillcentres

16. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Paymaster General what recent representations he has received about the provision of skillcentres; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: Since April 1986, I have received one letter about the provision of skillcentres.

The Skills Training Agency is moving forward on the basis of plans agreed by the Manpower Services Commission. I have every confidence that it is well on target to meet its objectives.

Tied Accommodation

17. Mr. Freud asked the Paymaster General how many people working in the public sector live in tied accommodation as a condition of employment.

Mr. Lang: I regret that the information requested is not held centrally.

Graduates

18. Mr. Evennett asked the Paymaster General what assessment he has made of the current employment prospects of graduates; and how these compare with previous years in the current decade.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am pleased to say that according to information published recently by the Association of Graduate Careers Advisory Services, the standing conference of employers of graduates and the central services unit of the university and polytechnic careers services, employment prospects for new graduates this year are better than they have been in any year since 1980. In 1980 49 per cent. of new graduates from both universities and polytechnics went directly into permanent employment in the United Kingdom. In 1981 this fell to 46 per cent. for university graduates and 45 per cent. for polytechnic graduates. By 1985 it had risen to 55 per cent. for university graduates and 59 per cent. for polytechnic graduates. However, by December 1985 only 9·5 per cent. of new graduates were still seeking employment and the majority of those people are likely to find employment within a year of graduating.

This year vacancies are 5 per cent. above the 1985 level and this increase affects graduates across all disciplines. Young people leaving higher education for the labour market this summer have very good job prospects, especially if they are prepared to be flexible and mobile.

Tourism

19. Mr. Coombs asked the Paymaster General if he has any plans for the promotion of tourism by the provision of increased indoor leisure and recreational facilities in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The Government have asked the English Tourist Board and the British Tourist Authority to give particular attention in their development work to extending the tourist season. This includes encouraging the provision of indoor leisure and recreational facilities.

61. Mr. Gregory asked the Paymaster General what steps he is taking to improve training schemes in the tourism industry.

Mr. Trippier: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) on 16 April at columns 386-87. Fuller information about education and training provision for tourism and improvements planned in this area is set out in paragraphs 29 to 33 and part 3 of "Action for Jobs in Tourism" which was published on 16 July. Copies are available in the Library.

62. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Paymaster General if he has any estimate as to whether the number of American tourists visiting Britain this summer has been increased by the recent British Airways marketing initiative in the United States of America.

Mr. Trippier: There is no doubt that the "Go for it America" campaign generated much positive publicity and good will. Together with the efforts of the British Tourist Authority and many others it has had a major effect on the market, and British Airways reports that its current level of forward bookings is now back to normal for the time of year.

70. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Paymaster General what steps he is taking together with his counterparts in other European Economic Community countries to co-ordinate and improve tourism within Europe as a whole.

Mr. Trippier: On 5 February 1986 the European Commission put forward a number of proposals for Community action in the field of tourism. I welcome the Community's interest in this important sector and the Government will certainly support work in areas in which the Community can play a useful role. A resolution inviting member states to encourage the seasonal and geographical spread of tourism was adopted by the Council on 23 June. We plan to carry forward discussions on the Commission's other proposals during the United Kingdom Presidency and to seek to reach agreement on them.

84. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Paymaster General what legislative barriers to the development of the tourist industry he has identified.

Mr. Trippier: The Government's report "Pleasure, Leisure and Jobs—The Business of Tourism," published in July 1985, identified a number of obstacles, including legislative barriers, to the faster development of the tourism industry and suggested, in a series of action points, how these might be overcome. "Action for Jobs in Tourism" published on 16 July describes the progress over the past year in implementing these recommendations.

Job Creation

20. Mr. Adley asked the Paymaster General what further steps he is taking to encourage the creation of employment in areas of high unemployment.

Mr. Lang: The country as a whole is benefiting from the Government's policies to stimulate enterprise and encourage job creation. Severe problems remain in some areas and these problems are being addressed through our regional industrial policy and other locally targeted measures, including our inner city initiatives. We are also tackling unemployment as it affects individuals through a wide range of measures detailed in our booklet "Action for Jobs", a copy of which is available in the Library.

21. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Paymaster General what funds have been received in the past 12 months from European Community funds to assist in creating new employment opportunities; and how these moneys have been disbursed.

Mr. Lang: During the calendar year 1985 new allocations totalling some £65·5 million were approved under the European social fund (ESF) for projects in the United Kingdom specifically related to employment creation. In addition, a further £238·5 million was approved under the social fund for other, mainly training, projects in the United Kingdom which will also help to create new employment opportunities. ESF funds are paid to the sponsors of the particular projects for which assistance is sought. Apart from social fund support, the United Kingdom also received considerable assistance under the European regional development fund (ERDF) towards projects which will increase overall employment opportunities.

Labour Statistics

22. Mr. Parry asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the latest unemployment figures.

Mr. Lang: On 12 June 1986, the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,229,400.

23. Mr. Duffy asked the Paymaster General what are the latest unemployment figures for the Sheffield travel-to-work area, in total and as a percentage.

Mr. Lang: On 12 June 1986, there were 46,689 unemployed claimants in the Sheffield travel-to-work area, which represents 16·1 per cent. of the sum of employees in employment and unemployed.

29. Mr. Cockeram asked the Paymaster General what were the numbers of males, the numbers of females and the total number of persons in work in the month of May in each of the years 1979 to 1986, inclusive.

Mr. Lang: Figures are not available for May. The available information is as follows:

Employed Labour Force in Great Britain
Seasonally Adjusted: thousand

	Males	Females	Total of Males and Females
June of each year
1979	14,974	9,801	24,775
1980	14,889	9,820	24,709
1981	14,234	9,521	23,756
1982	13,900	9,439	23,339
1983	13,659	9,398	23,057
1984	13,823	9,702	23,525
1985	13,937	9,919	23,856
March
1986*	13,957	10,073	24,030

* The latest date for which an estimate is available.
The employed labour force is the sum of employees in employment, the self-employed and HM forces.

34. Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Paymaster General why the self-employed are not at present taken into consideration when the percentage of the working population which is unemployed is compiled.

Mr. Lang: Last week we introduced new national and regional rates which express the unemployed as a percentage of the whole working population including the self-employed and the armed forces. Unemployment rates for travel-to-work areas and counties continue to be expressed as a percentage of the unemployed plus employees because information on the self-employed and armed forces needed to calculate the wider based rates is not available frequently enough below regional level.

40. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the current level of unemployment.

51. Mr. Eadie asked the Paymaster General how many people were unemployed at the latest available date.

55. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the latest unemployment figures.

Mr. Lang: On 12 June 1986. The number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,229,372.

41. Mr. Welsh asked the Paymaster General how many people have been unemployed for more than 12 months; and what percentage of the total unemployed this figure represents.

Mr. Lang: On 10 April 1986, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by duration is available, the number of claimants in the United Kingdom who had been unemployed for over 12 months was 1,356,509, which represents 40·8 per cent. of the total.

49. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Paymaster General what is the average rate of unemployment for all the regions of the United Kingdom outside the south-east.

Mr. Lang: On 12 June 1986 unemployment in the United Kingdom excluding the south-east region represented 13·3 per cent. of the working population.

56. Mr. Haynes asked the Paymaster General what is the present rate of unemployment; and how this compares with the rate for June 1979.

Mr. Lang: Seasonally adjusted unemployment in the United Kingdom on 12 June represented 11·7 per cent. of the working population. The estimate on the same basis for June 1979 was 4·2 per cent.

59. Mr. Hardy asked the Paymaster General if he is satisfied that the official employment statistics accurately reflect the levels of unemployment nationally and in areas of high unemployment, such as the Wentworth constituency.

Mr. Lang: I am satisfied that the monthly unemployment count is an accurate record of those claiming benefits, although the figures do not necessarily reflect the number of people seeking work. Preliminary results of the labour force summary conducted in spring 1985 showed some 1,080,000 people included in the monthly count who either had a job or were not seeking work. While 760,000 people without jobs and seeking work were excluded from the claimant total.

I am also satisfied with the accuracy of the allocation of unemployed claimants to local areas. Such as constituencies.

64. Mr. Barron asked the Paymaster General what is the total number of unemployed in the Rother Valley; how many have been unemployed over 12 months and 24 months respectively; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: On 10 April 1986, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by duration is available, there were 6,447 unemployed claimants in the Rother Valley parliamentary constituency. Of these, 2,293 and 1,452 had been unemployed for over 12 months and 24 months, respectively.

71. Mr. Alton asked the Paymaster General how many people in the Liverpool travel-to-work area have been unemployed for periods longer than three years.

Mr. Lang: On 10 April 1986, the latest date an analysis of unemployment by duration is available, the number of claimants in the Liverpool travel-to-work area who had been unemployed for over three years was 27,845

76. Mr. Dixon asked the Paymaster General how many people have been unemployed for more than 12 months, 24 months and 36 months, respectively, at the latest available date.

Mr. Lang: On 10 April, 1986, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by duration is available, the numbers of claimants in the United Kingdom who had been unemployed for over 12 months, 24 months and 36 months, were 1,356,509, 845,168 and 566,965, respectively.

Mr. Leadbitter asked the Paymaster General if he will provide figures to the latest date on the numbers out of work between the ages of 16 years and 21 years, 21 years and 45 years and 45 years and 65 years in Hartlepool, stating in each category, the numbers unemployed for more than one year, between six months and one year, and below six months; and what is the total number in each category receiving training under Government training schemes and the number between 16 years and 18 years who never had a job or any training.

Mr. Lang: The following table gives the available information, which is also in the Library, in respect of unemployed claimants on 10 April 1986, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by age and duration is available, for the Hartlepool local authority district.

	16-19 years	20-44 years	45 years and over
Total unemployed	1,426	5,652	2,280
Unemployed over one year	246	2,866	1,392
Unemployed 6 months to one year	404	874	335
Unemployed under 6 months	776	1,912	553

Information about the numbers of people in training is not available in the form requested, because the Manpower Services Commission does not record the age or length of the period of previous unemployment. However, on 30 June 1986, the latest date for which figures are available, in the Hartlepool local authority district there were 1,012 young people in training on YTS, all of whom would normally be under 21 years of age and the vast majority of whom would be 16 to 17 years old. There were also 50 people in training, on various Government adult training schemes. All of these trainees were 18 years old or over.

On 12 June 1986 there were 590 unemployed claimants in the Hartlepool local authority district under 19 years of age who had never had a job since leaving full-time education. It is not known how many of those have received training.

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Paymaster General what are the latest figures for seasonally adjusted unemployment in (a) Scotland and (b) Great Britain; and what information he has about the latest figures for Sweden, Finland, Austria and Switzerland.

Mr. Lang: The following table gives the available information for the countries requested. The figures are based on national definitions, using different methods of compilation, and are therefore not fully comparable.

	Latest Month	Total (Thousands)	Percentage
Scotland	June 1986	342	13·6
Great Britain	June 1986	3,094	11·5
Sweden	December 1985	131	2·9
Finland	February 1986	180	7·1
Austria	May 1986	†143	†4·9
Switzerland*	March 1986	25	0·9

* not seasonally adjusted.

Small Firms (Loan Guarantee Scheme)

24. Mr. Jessel asked the Paymaster General how many small firms have borrowed through the loan guarantee scheme in the most recent period for which figures are available.

Mr. Trippier: In the year April 1985 to March 1986, 522 guarantees were issued to small businesses under the loan guarantee scheme. Since the scheme's renewal, that is between 1 May and end of June this year, 251 guarantees have been issued.

Youth Training Scheme

25. Mr. Wainwright asked the Paymaster General what is the estimated total demand for two-year YTS places for 1986-87 and 1987-88; and how many such places have so far been offered by managing agents and approved.

Mr. Trippier: We estimate that around 360,000 young people will join two-year YTS in 1986-87 and 1987-88 made up of 315,000 16-year-olds and 45,000 to 50,000 17-year-olds. To cater for these numbers the Manpower Services Commission will need around 371,000 places; to date all 1986-87 places have been offered and at 1 July 1986 332,189 places have been approved.

46. Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Paymaster General what proportion of (a) black and (b) white young people currently obtain employment after leaving YTS.

Mr. Trippier: The Manpower Services Commission conducts a regular follow-up survey of all YTS leavers. The latest results, covering those who left YTS schemes between April 1985 and January 1986, show that 57 per cent. of white young people, 35 per cent. of those of Black/African/Caribbean descent and 34 per cent. of those of Indian sub-continent descent were in work some three months after leaving. At the same stage, a further 3 per cent. of white young people, 9 per cent. of those of Black/African/Caribbean descent and 10 per cent. of those of Indian sub-continent descent were on a full-time course of education/training.

50. Mr. Hayes asked the Paymaster General how many YTS places have been taken up in tourism and leisure industries.

Mr. Trippier: I am unable to give up-to-date information as our system of collecting statistics based on occupations is at present being revised. But YTS does make a significant contribution to training in tourism-related industries, and at the end of last year was providing around 11,000 places in hotels and catering and the travel trade.

54. Mr. Wallace asked the Paymaster General what training has been given to Manpower Services Commission staff employed as programme managers and programme assessors at the area offices to enable them to carry out the monitoring role required by the two-year YTS.

Mr. Trippier: Staff of the Manpower Services Commission receive a comprehensive range of training designed to equip them with the necessary skills and knowledge to operate effectively.

Staff involved in monitoring YTS undertake a six-month training programme linked to individual training needs. In addition, a special intensive training programme has been mounted to train staff for their role in the approval process for training organisations in two-year YTS.

57. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Paymaster General if he will give the actual number of YTS places in the United Kingdom, the east midlands and Leicester, with the respective percentage take-up rate and the number of young people who have been taken into full-time employment.

Mr. Trippier: The table gives the following information for Great Britain, the east midlands and Leicester:

1. The planned number of YTS places for 1986-87;
2. The number of places already contracted as at 1 July 1986;
3. The proportion of young people who completed YTS in April 1985 to January 1986 who responded to the follow-up survey by reporting that they were, firstly, in full-time employment, and, secondly, in full-time employment or further education and training.

	Great Britain	East Midlands	Leicester
Planned places 1986-87	456,594	36,495	11,301
Contracted places as at 1 July 1986	332,480	23,076	7,100
Proportion of young people in full-time employment —percentage	53	57	64
Proportion of young people in full-time employment or further education and training—percentage	66	72	78

60. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Paymaster General what information he has as to how many YTS trainees are learning administrative skills; and what type of training they are receiving.

Mr. Trippier: I regret that I cannot give all the information requested. The system of collecting statistics based on occupations is at present being revised and therefore the number of people receiving training in administrative skills is not available at the moment.

YTS trainees learning administrative skills normally enter broad-based business. Clerical and office schemes which cover a wide range of basic clerical skills as well as introducing trainees to computers, information technology and commonly used office equipment and systems.

63. Mr. Mark Hughes asked the Paymaster General what is the retention rate for young people finishing YTS programmes.

Mr. Trippier: The results from the Manpower Services Commission's regular follow-up survey of all YTS leavers are placed in the Library each month. The latest results covering those who left YTS between April 1985 and January 1986 show that 28 per cent. of all leavers and 41 per cent. of all who completed their time on YTS were in work with the same employer who provided their training some three months later. Altogether 57 per cent. of leavers were in employment and two thirds either in work or full-time education or training.

74. Mr. Nellist asked the Paymaster General how many young people are presently employed under the YTS.

Mr. Trippier: At the end of June 1986, the latest date for which statistics are available, the Manpower Services Commission management information system had recorded 280,194 young people in training on YTS in Great Britain.

Inner Cities Initiative

26. Mr. Sayeed asked the Paymaster General what progress has been made with the inner cities initiative.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Encouraging progress has been made since the initiative was announced on 6 February.

We are tackling a number of major issues including the need to ensure that urban development projects in inner cities produce more work and training opportunities for residents.

We are also taking various measures to encourage enterprise, particularly among the ethnic minorities. We are aiming to set up enterprise agencies, particularly for ethnic minorities, managed workshops and skill training facilities. We are also exploring other ways of giving more positive help to small businesses in partnership with the private sector.

Highfields Task Force (Leicester)

27. Mr. Spencer asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the progress of the work of the Highfields task force in Leicester.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Our Highfields task force was established towards the end of March. It has now completed its initial work in establishing contact with the residents and appraising the problems of the locality. It has held discussions with a wide variety of local community and voluntary organisations, with the local authorities and with the private sector. Plans are now being drawn up aimed at tackling the urgent problems of the area.

We would be able to make faster progress in Highfields if the city council and local activists felt able to take a constructive and co-operative approach to our work.

Payment of Bills

30. Mr. Nicholls asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the response to the guidance booklet on payment of bills published on 20 May.

32. Mr. Knowles asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the response to the guidance booklet on payment of bills published on 20 May.

Mr. Trippier: I refer my hon. Friends to my reply earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Ottaway).

Restart Scheme

31. Mr. Lawler asked the Paymaster General what progress has been made in extending restart nationwide.

Mr. Lang: Jobcentre staff have now started counselling long-term unemployed people in all areas of the country.

Up to 12 June 7,469 people have been counselled; 998 were submitted to jobs; 1,214 were submitted to community programme places; 65 were submitted to a voluntary projects programme place; 401 were submitted to a jobclub; 901 were referred for training; 1,232 were allocated to restart courses; 471 were offered an opportunity under the enterprise allowance scheme; and 868 were referred to other services.

36. Mr Butterfill asked the Paymaster General what steps he is taking to ensure that counsellors under the restart scheme are adequately briefed on job opportunities in tourism.

Mr. Lang: Care has been taken to ensure that jobcentre staff counselling the long-term unemployed under the restart scheme have a full knowledge of all opportunities including those in tourism.

They have access to all notified vacancies, current local labour market information and guidance literature to enable submission to be made to jobs or training.

College of the Air

33. Mr. Malins asked the Paymaster General what plans have been developed to introduce a College of the Air.

Mr. Trippier: I refer my hon. Friend to my right hon. and learned Friend's statement on Friday 18 July at column 1358.

Adult Education

35. Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Paymaster General if he has any plans to increase the availability of open and distance learning for adults, particularly unemployed adults.

Mr. Trippier: Yes. The Manpower Services Commission's Open Tech programme is increasing the amount of open learning material available to individuals for retraining and updating of their skills. Over 18,000 hours of Open Tech material is now available, and over 25,000 people have benefited from it. These figures are likely to double by March 1987. MSC is increasing the use of open learning within all its training schemes, including schemes which help unemployed people. The Government are considering plans for the further development of open learning beyond 1987.

Long-term Unemployed Persons

37. Mr. James Lamond asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the latest progress of the Government's measures to help the long-term unemployed.

Mr. Lang: The new restart programme which was extended nationwide from 1 July and under which all long-term unemployed people will be invited for a jobcentre interview by the end of next March has been widely welcomed, notably by the long-term unemployed themselves. In the period to 12 June, in those areas where the programme started early, 95 per cent. of those invited to be interviewed in the period responded positively by attending for their interview. We are also continuing to expand the community programme which will provide worthwhile job opportunities for over 300,000 long-term unemployed people in a full year. The range of our employment, training and enterprise measures is set out in our booklet "Action for Jobs" which has been widely distributed and positively received.

45. Mr. Hirst asked the Paymaster General what new initiatives his Department is taking to assist the longer-term unemployed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: The restart programme for the long-term unemployed was extended nationwide on 1 July. Everyone who has been unemployed for a year or more will be invited for a jobcentre interview and offered one or more of eight positive opportunities designed to help them back into employment.

67. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Paymaster General how many of the long-term unemployed have been interviewed under the Government's measures to help the long-term unemployed; and how many have been found full-time jobs.

Mr. Lang: 35,644 people have been interviewed under the Government's measures to help the long-term unemployed; 28,175 under the pilot initiatives in nine selected areas of the country and 7,469 under the national restart programme.

Four thousand three hundred and twenty-two in the pilot areas have left the unemployment register since being interviewed; 1,605 of these were placed in jobs or community programme vacancies as a direct result of submissions made during the counselling interviews. It is not known how many of these were full-time jobs or full-time places on the community programme.

In addition, 166 people were placed in jobs or community programme places under the national restart programme.

It is not known how many of those who left the register did so as a result of referrals made by the normal jobcentre services subsequent to their restart counselling.

Manpower Services Commission

38. Mr. Corbyn asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement about the role of the Manpower Services Commission in education and training over the next three years.

Mr. Trippier: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) on 15 July at column 455.

86. Mr. Eastham asked the Paymaster General if he plans to reply to the Employment Committee's recent report on the Manpower Services Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government's response to the Employment Select Committee's report on the Manpower Services Commission's corporate plan 1986-90 was sent to the Chairman of the Employment Select Committee on 6 May.

Travel-to-Work Areas

39. Mr. Bill Walker asked the Paymaster General if he will consider changing the name of travel-to-work areas to employment information areas.

Mr. Lang: No. Travel-to-work areas are so called because they are areas within which a substantial proportion of those who live also work, and vice versa.

Industrial Relations

43. Mr. Fatchett asked the Paymaster General what plans his Department has for legislation in the field of industrial relations.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have no plans at present for further legislation in the field of industrial relations but we are keeping the situation under review.

National Dock Labour Scheme

44. Mr. Colvin asked the Paymaster General what discussions he has had, and with whom, about the future of the national dock labour scheme.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have had no discussions about the future of the national dock labour scheme. It has been made clear—most recently by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in reply to a question from the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) on 22 April at column 121—that we were not proposing to change the national dock labour scheme.

Local Enterprise Agencies

47. Mr. Bellingham asked the Paymaster General if he will give the up-to-date position on the number of local enterprise agencies.

Mr. Trippier: There are currently 342 local enterprise agencies throughout the United Kingdom, of which 261 are approved under the terms of the Finance Act 1982 which allows business sector sponsors tax relief on their contributions to such bodies.

Job Release Scheme

48. Mr. Knox asked the Paymaster General how many people were in receipt of allowances under the job release scheme in each of the past three years.

Mr. Lang: The numbers of people in receipt of a job release allowance in each of the past three years are as follows:

April	Number
1984	94,000
1985	67,000
1986	40,000

Local Employment Initiative

52. Mr. O'Brien asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement about his Department's support for local employment initiative.

Mr. Trippier: Much of my Department's work to stimulate enterprise and small firms and to promote job creation is delivered at the local level. Indeed, local networks of support are an important contributor to local economic development and I am anxious to see my Department's programmes contribute fully to such networks.

At the international level, both the European Community and the Organisation for Economic Development and Co-operation are studying local employment initiatives among their member states. The United Kingdom is, through my Department, playing an active part in that work.

Disabled Persons (Adaptations to Premises)

53. Mr. Wareing asked the Paymaster General if he is satisfied with the level of take-up of grants for the adaptations to premises and equipment scheme for the purpose of improving the employment prospects of disabled people.

Mr. Lang: I am pleased with the current, substantially increased, level of take-up and satisfied that the scheme is being vigorously marketed.

Young Workers Scheme

58. Mr. James Hamilton asked the Paymaster General what is the current rate of retention among young people employed under the Government's young workers scheme.

Mr. Lang: A survey of the young workers scheme in 1985 suggested that employers expected at least 90 per cent. of young workers would continue in their current job beyond the period of eligibility for young workers scheme support. Preliminary results from a more recent survey, carried out between three and 11 months after the end of the support period, found that the original young worker post still existed in 82 per cent. of cases (although not necessarily filled by the same young worker), while more than 50 per cent. of the young workers continued to be employed by the same firm (although not necessarily in the same post).

Out-of-town Shopping Centres

65. Mr. Favell asked the Paymaster General what assessment he has made of the implication for employment in inner cities of the growth of out-of-town shopping centres; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My Department has not made a detailed assessment. However, my hon. Friend will be aware that the Government announced the setting up of the inner city initiative on 6 February, which aims to improve the employment prospects of residents in eight inner city areas in England. We have set up task forces in each area and we will take account of such developments in preparing our local plans of action.

Disabled People

66. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Paymaster General what proportion of the staff employed by his Department are disabled.

Mr. Lang: At the end of May 1986 1·7 per cent. of the staff of the Department of Employment were registered as disabled.

Jobcentres

68. Mr. Greenway asked the Paymaster General by what criteria he judges the efficiency of jobcentres; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: The MSC annual report details the aims, objectives and achievements of jobcentres nationally and by region.

A number of measures exist for determining the efficiency and effectiveness of jobcentres: for example, the number of people (including disabled people) placed in work or on the community programme; the number of training course applications; the MSC costs and staff numbers associated with these activities; the proportion of vacancies notified to jobcentres which they succeed in filling; jobclub performance.

I am pleased to note that jobcentre efficiency generally continues to improve.

New Businesses (Basildon)

69. Mr. Amess asked the Paymaster General how many new businesses have been started in Basildon in each of the last five years.

Mr. Trippier: I regret that the information requested is not available.

School Leavers (Stoke)

72. Mr. Ashley asked the Paymaster General what information he has regarding the prospect of jobs for school leavers in the Stoke-on-Trent travel-to-work area.

Mr. Trippier: Job prospects for young people in the Stoke-on-Trent travel-to-work area depend on a sustained improvement in the performance of industry, business and the economy as a whole. Our economic policies are designed to create the conditions for that improvement and we are making substantial progress. We also need levels of pay which ensure the competitiveness of our industry.

In 1986-87 two-year YTS will provide 11,580 places in Staffordshire, with a further 2,060 continuation places being provided for young people who entered training last year. The job prospects of those completing YTS and those ineligible for training will be further enhanced by the new workers scheme.

Those young people who have been unemployed for some time will be able to benefit from temporary employment under the community programme. At June 1986, 4,775 places were available in Staffordshire and the target is to increase this figure to 4,945 by October this year. Our other employment measures will also directly or indirectly benefit young people.

Action for Jobs Programme

73. Mr. Latham asked the Paymaster General whether he will make a statement on progress on the action for jobs programme.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In the first three months of the action for jobs campaign. We estimate that some 1·25 million members of the public have picked up a copy of the "Action for Jobs" booklet. In addition, some 500,000 copies have been directly distributed. Our research shows that the booklet has been very positively received both in terms of its clarity and layout and its usefulness in telling people about the wide range of opportunities provided by our employment, training and enterprise measures.

Parental and Family Leave

75. Mr. Maclennan asked the Paymaster General what recent representations he has received concerning parental and family leave.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to the answer which my hon. Friend gave to the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) on 12 June at column 417.

Between 12 June and 10 July we had received 122 representations.

Wandsworth

77. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Paymaster General what is the present number of people registered as unemployed in the London borough of Wandsworth and the number of job vacancies registered at local jobcentres.

Mr. Lang: On 12 June 1986, the number of unemployed claimants in the London borough of Wandsworth was 16,280. On 6 June 1986 the number of unfilled vacancies at the Balham, Clapham Junction and Tooting jobcentres, which cover an area closely corresponding to the London borough of Wandsworth, was 892.

Manufacturing Industry

78. Mr. Kennedy asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the estimated future opportunities for employment in the manufacturing sector of the economy.

Mr. Lang: Future levels of employment in manufacturing depend on the quality of the sector's response to market change.

80. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Paymaster General if he will estimate the proportion of the working population currently employed in manufacturing industry and give the comparable figures for 1984 and 1985.

Mr. Lang: In March 1986 (the latest date for which an estimate is available) 20·6 per cent. of the working population in Great Britain were employed, as employees in employment or self-employed, in manufacturing industry. The comparable figures for March 1984 and March 1985 were 21·3 per cent. and 21 per cent., respectively.

On-site Factory Inspectors

79. Mr. Litherland asked the Paymaster General how many on-site factory inspectors were employed by the Health and Safety Executive at the latest available date.

Mr. Trippier: On 1 July 1986, 514 of Health and Safety Executive's factory inspectors were employed on inspection duties in the field.

EC Presidency

81. Mr. Lord asked the Paymaster General what assessment he makes of the scope, now that the United Kingdom has the presidency of the European Community, for European co-operation in tackling unemployment.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I think that there are now better prospects for European co-operation in tackling unemployment than there have been at any time since we became a member of the European Community. Following the meeting of the Council of Labour and Social Affairs Ministers on 5 June, at which I tabled the paper "Employment Growth into the 1990s—A strategy for the Labour Market" in conjunction with the Employment Ministers of Italy and the Republic of Ireland. I consider that there is now a substantial prospect of the Council adopting an employment strategy along the lines of the paper during the United Kingdom Presidency. Our aim is that such a strategy should be based on the need to encourage enterprise and self-employment; flexible employment patterns and conditions of work; training; and help for long-term unemployed people.

TVEI

82. Mr. Stern asked the Paymaster General if, in appropriate circumstances, he will accept less than three years as a trial period for any education authority before permitting that authority to enter the national technical and vocational education initiative scheme.

Mr. Trippier: We believe that it would normally be appropriate for an education authority to have had at least three years experience of participation in the technical and vocational education initiative before beginning to extend the initiative across all authorities' educational institutions. There are no plans at present to make any exceptions.

83. Mr. Hancock asked the Paymaster General how much money the technical and vocational education initiative will provide per pupil; and what was the comparable figure on the pilot scheme.

Mr. Trippier: Maximum allocations of funds will be determined for individual local education authorities, but authorities will have considerable freedom to propose how they allocate the funds available to meet the aims of the initiative. In contrast to the pilot phase there will be no requirement for separate cohorts of TVEI students of a particular size. It is not therefore possible to quote a meaningful figure for direct expenditure per pupil.

Sandwell

87. Miss Boothroyd asked the Paymaster General what plans he has to increase the level of employment of young people in Sandwell.

Mr. Lang: An increase in the level of employment of young people in Sandwell will depend on a sustained improvement in the performance of industry, business and the economy as a whole. Our economic policies are designed to create the conditions for that improvement and we are making substantial progress. We also need levels of pay which ensure the competitiveness of our industry.

In 1986-87 two-year YTS will provide 6,941 places in Dudley/Sandwell, with a further 1,397 continuation places being provided for young people who entered training last year. The job prospects of those completing YTS and those ineligible for training will be further enhanced by the new workers scheme.

Those young people who have been unemployed for some time will be able to benefit from temporary employment under the community programme. At June 1986, 4,090 places were available in Dudley/Sandwell and the target is to increase this figure to 4,328 by October this year. Our other employment measures will also directly or indirectly benefit young people.

Careers Service

Mr. Lawler asked the Paymaster General what output and performance indicators are used to measure the effectiveness of the careers service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: Responsibility for the effectiveness of careers services rests primarily with the local education authorities. Information about the variety of ways in which they assess the output and performance of their services is not collated centrally.

However, my Department, through the work of the Careers Service Inspectorate, aims to ensure that authorities provide an effective properly managed service in accordance with the guidance of a general character issued to them by the Secretary of State.

In addition, authorities are required to provide statistical information on the work of their services to the Department. A revised and improved return is being introduced in October.

Gosport

Mr. Viggers asked the Paymaster General what is the current level of unemployment in Gosport.

Mr. Lang: The following information is in the Library. On 12 June 1986 the number of unemployed claimants in the Gosport parliamentary constituency was 4,003. The corresponding number in the Gosport local authority area was 3,654.

US Tourists

Mr. Chapman asked the Paymaster General what is his latest estimate of the number of United States tourists expected to visit Britain in 1986.

Mr. Trippier: Following record levels of incoming tourism in 1985 the upward trend was sustained during the first quarter of 1986 when visits from north America were up by 15 per cent. However, during April visits from north America to Britain fell by 19 per cent. over the corresponding period last year. We have no firm predictions for the rest of the year but the British Tourist Authority reports that traffic is now picking up again. This should be reflected in the figures for the number of visitors to Britain which will be available later this year.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Remands in Custody

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons were remanded in custody before trial for scheduled offences, non-scheduled offences, and both together, in the first six months of 1986.

Mr. Scott: The numbers are 611 persons for scheduled offences and 449 persons for non-scheduled offences.

Mr. Scott: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave on 7 July 1986 at columns 17-19.

Michael Tighe

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether Mr. Sampson has been given access to either of the two tape recordings from the shed where Michael Tighe died in Northern Ireland in 1982 in the course of his inquiry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The progress of Mr. Sampson's inquiry is a matter for him and the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will take steps to safeguard the tape recorded by the security services on a device in the shed where Michael Tighe was shot dead in Northern Ireland in 1982; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that my right hon. Friend gave to a question by him on 7 July 1986 at column 84.

Royal Ulster Constabulary

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many guests of his Department have been right hon. and hon. Members in the years to the end of May 1985 and 1986; and how many of those right hon. and hon. Members have visited (a) the Royal Ulster Constabulary stations and (b) military posts.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 8 July 1986, c. 114]: In the years ending May 1985 and May 1986 the number of right hon. and hon. Members whose visits to the Province were either directly or indirectly organised through the Northern Ireland Office was 101 and 64 respectively. Of these 15 and 21 respectively visited the Royal Ulster Constabulary and three visited the Army in each year in question.

Further Education Colleges

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what information is available on the number of full-time youth training programme places allocated to each of the further education colleges in Northern Ireland at present and for each of the past three years;

(2) what information is available on the number of full-time youth training programme places allocated to each of the Government training centres, youth and community workshops and other providers currently and for each of the past three years.

Dr. Boyson [pursuant to his reply, 16 July 1986, c. 547]: The information specifically requested by the hon. Gentleman in regard to full-time training provision within the youth training programme is as follows.

Figures for 1983-84 are shown separately as they are not directly comparable with those for the subsequent years. The year 1983-84 was the first full recruitment year of the youth training programme. Without an established proven basis of demand there was considerable overprovision of places in both the first and second year full-time training schemes. In addition, the places provided offered training primarily based in one establishment and of a particular kind to young people; there was little complementarity in what was on offer to young people, even within one locality.

At the beginning of 1984 several major structural changes were made to the youth training programme which affected the way in which providers contributed to the delivery of training. Figures for 1984-85 and subsequent years are not therefore comparable to those provided for 1983-84. First of all, from 1984-85 onwards provision of training places has been matched very closely to demand. Secondly, full-time training has been delivered through partnerships of two or more training providers to give young people off-the-job training, further education and work experience. One provider acts as lead partner but all contribute to the training of the young people. Places are not allocated to individual providers, but each lead partner is invited to meet recruitment targets for his partnership. The following statistics relate to the targets which each partner has been invited to meet, for 1984-85, 1985-86 and in the current year 1986-87; in some cases they were not met; and in other cases they were considerably exceeded.

Antrim RUC Station

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many police dogs are based at Antrim Royal Ulter Constabulary station; and what are their ages and breeds.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 17 July 1986, c. 617]: None.

Explosives

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he has been able to identify (a) the make and (b) the type of fertiliser used by the Irish Republican Army in explosive mixtures.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 17 July 1986, c. 621-22]: Yes. For security reasons it would not be right to give further details.

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information he has as to how much of the fertiliser used by the Irish Republican Army in its explosive mixtures was sold in Northern Ireland in the current year and in 1985.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 17 July 1986, c. 622]: The agricultural fertiliser on which terrorists in Northern Ireland base their home made explosives is widely used in both Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland. The nature of the component parts of the fertiliser makes it impossible to distinguish accurately how much was sold in Northern Ireland.

O-Level Examination Results

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will make a statement on the O-level pass rate expressed as a percentage of the total school population in Northern Ireland at the latest date for which figures are available.

Dr. Mawhinney [pursuant to his reply, 21 July 1986]: Comparisons are inappropriate between O-level passes and a total school population which, for example, includes primary age pupils. However, in 1983-84 94·3 per cent. of school leavers in Northern Ireland who attempted GCE O-level examinations obtained one or more passes at or above grade E and 79·8 per cent. passes at or above grade C.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Visitors

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Lord Privy Seal what is his estimate of the increase in the numbers of the public visiting the Palace of Westminster over the last 10 years; what is his estimate of the resultant increased cost to public funds; whether he is satisfied with the necessary security arrangements; if he will raise with the Services Committee the possibility of placing a box for voluntary contributions towards the upkeep of the Palace at points of ingress and egress; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Harcourt Room

Mr. Corbyn asked the Lord Privy Seal what is the average cost per meal served in the Harcourt Room and what is the average price paid.

Mr. Irving: I have been asked to reply.

In the Harcourt Room the menu is classed as a la carte. It being up to the customer to choose his own selection, it is therefore difficult to assess an average price.

WALES

Lambs (Radiation)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many lambs have been identified as having radiation levels above 1,000 bequerels/kilogram since 3 July in each of the districts of Arfon, Dwyfor, Ynys Môn, Meirionnydd and Aberconwy, respectively; and how many lambs have been sampled for radioactivity in each of these districts since that date.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Information for the period from 3 July to 15 July is in the following table:

Arfon	83	0
Dwyfor	19	0
Ynys Môn	253	1
Meirionnydd	45	5
Aberconwy	30	0

Planning Appeals

Sir Anthony Meyer asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many refusals of planning permission by local authorities in Wales have been reversed on appeal to him during the last period of 12 months for which figures are available.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Three hundred and forty five refusals of planning permission by local authorities in Wales were reversed on appeal during the period 1 July 1985 to 30 June 1986.

Private Rents

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has on the average rent in Wales charged by private landlords to tenants.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The Department does not collect information on rents charged by private landlords in Wales.

Council Rents

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the average rent in Wales charged by local authorities to tenants.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The average weekly rent per dwelling charged by local authorities in Wales in 1985-86 (the latest year for which information is available) was £16·47.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of council tenants in Wales receive housing benefit, distinguishing between those below and above retirement age.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Council tenants are eligible for two components of housing benefit: rate rebates and rent rebates. Information held centrally does not enable the level of rates rebates paid to council tenants to be determined. However, in 1984-85, the latest year for which figures are available, 71·3 per cent. of council tenants in Wales received rent rebates.

It is not possible to establish the proportion of recipients who are above or below retirement age.

Sheltered Accommodation

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many Welsh people have lived in sheltered accommodation in each of the last five years.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Sheltered housing takes a number of forms in both the public and private sectors and information on the numbers of people who have lived in such housing is not available centrally.

Local Authorities (Employment)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has as to the number of people directly employed by each Welsh (a) county council and (b) district council in each year from 1979 to 1986.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Local authority staff numbers at March of each year, excluding employees employed under special employment and training measures, are given in the following table:

Leasehold Property

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has as to how many people in Wales occupy property under leasehold arrangements.

Mr. Mark Robinson: At the time of the 1981 census there were 310,891 residents in leasehold owner-occupied property in Wales. Information on the tenure of rented property is not available.

House Building

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many houses were constructed by the public sector in Wales in (a) 1979 and (b) 1985.

Mr. Mark Robinson: 4,351 and 1,673 dwellings were completed by the public sector in Wales in 1979 and 1985 respectively.

Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Wales how the numbers of dwellings completed in Wales in May 1986 compared with the equivalent in May 1985; and how the numbers of dwelling completed from March to May 1986 compare with the number of dwellings completed in March to May 1985.

Mr. Mark Robinson: In May 1986 659 dwellings were completed in Wales, as compared with 797 in the same month of 1985. From March to May 1986, 1,839 dwellings were completed, as against 2,162 in the same period of the preceding year.

Radiotherapy (Swansea and Cardiff)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will place in the Library a copy of the review into the provision of radiotherapy services at Singleton hospital, Swansea and Velindre hospital, Cardiff.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The review of the radiotherapy service provided at Singleton and Velindre hospitals is being undertaken by officials to enable the Department and the district health authorities which manage the service to ensure that appropriate provision is being made. It is, therefore, an internal review which is not intended for publication.

Dairies

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many dairies are supplied by the Milk Marketing Board in Wales each year.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Twenty-four dairies are supplied by the Milk Marketing Board in Wales.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much milk is supplied by the Milk Marketing Board to dairies in Wales each year.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: In the year ending March 1985, 1,640·7 million litres of milk were produced off farms in Wales and supplied mainly to dairies in Wales.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he is satisfied with the arrangements which presently exist for the supply of milk to dairies in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The allocation of milk to dairies in Wales is a matter for the Milk Marketing Board, in conjuction with representatives of milk buyers.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many people are employed by dairies in Wales; and how this figure compares with the figures for 1979 and 1983, respectively;

(2) how many people are employed in the production of cheese in Wales; and how this figure compares with those for 1979 and 1983, respectively.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Full information is only available from the census of employment which shows that there were 3,300 employed in milk and milk products industries in 1981. Estimates—on a basis not wholly comparable with this source — made in the annual census of production suggest that the figures for 1979, 1983, and 1984 respectively, were approximately 3,400, 3,200 and 2,700.

Butter

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how much butter is presently stored, under EEC rules, in Wales at the latest available date;

(2) how much butter is stored in each intervention store in Wales at the latest available date.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: At 30 June, 19,531 tonnes of butter were held in eight cold stores at the following locations:

Location	Tonnes
Cardiff (3 stores)	13,448
Newport	1,180
Rhyl	951
Swansea	3,192
Milford Haven	480
Whitland	280

In addition there were 1,350 tonnes in private storage on which aid was being paid.

Llandeilo (Aid)

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will take steps to make available funds from the European regional development fund in a similar arrangement to that now available through the Mid-Wales Development area to the Llandeilo travel-to-work area.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The arrangement under which the area served by the Development Board for Rural Wales qualifies for assistance from the regional development fund was negotiated with the European Commission as an exceptional measure and we see no prospect of its extension to other areas.

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will take steps to make available to the Llandeilo travel-to-work area grants to communities and voluntary organisations for projects to improve social and community facilities such as are now available within the area of Mid-Wales Development;

(2) if he will take steps to make available to the Llandeilo travel-to-work area office and service industry grants similar to the ones available through the Mid-Wales Development area.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: We have no plans to extend the area served by the Development Board for Rural Wales or to change the remit of other agencies. Support for areas such as Llandeilo continues to be provided in a variety of ways by the Welsh Development Agency and other bodies.

Welsh Language

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will introduce legislation to give equal official status to the Welsh language in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: We are giving careful consideration to the provisions contained in the Bill introduced by the hon. Gentleman on 1 July under the ten-minute rule.

Teacher Training

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he has reached a decision on the advice given by the Wales Advisory Body about the future provision of initial teacher training courses in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: At its meeting on 27 June the Wales Advisory Body recommended that there should be an urgent review of all initial teacher training in the public and university sectors in Wales and that it should be undertaken jointly by WAB and the University Grants Committee. WAB further recommended that decisions on the rationalisation of initial teacher training in the public sector should await the outcome of the review. The University Grants Committee has agreed to take part in the joint review which will produce recommendations within a period of 12 months.

It is very important that the future arrangements for initial teacher training should make the most effective use of the facilities and resources available and that teachers should receive the best possible preparation and training for a very demanding career. After careful consideration I have decided to accept the WAB's advice that rationalisation of public sector provision should await the outcome of the joint review. This will enable the strengths which exist in both sectors to be taken fully into account in shaping the future pattern of provision. In line with this decision I shall be allocating student places to public sector institutions for one year only in 1987. Allocations for 1988 and 1989 will be announced after the review has been completed and decisions on future arrangements have been taken.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Social Security Bill

88. Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his best available estimate of the likely reduction in the numbers registered as unemployed as a consequence of clause 41 of the Social Security Bill.

Mr. Newton: At present some claimants who are disqualified from receiving unemployment benefit under section 20(1) of the Social Security Act 1975 continue to sign on as unemployed, although they are not entitled to supplementary benefit or credits. As a consequence of clause 41 (now clause 42) of the Social Security Bill, a number of these may decide not to sign on during the period of disqualification and will not therefore appear in the count of unemployed. Some 2,000 to 3,000 might cease to do so.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Robin Cook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people claimed supplementary benefit in Livingston constituency in (a) 1979 and (b) 1985; what percentage change that represents; and what was the percentage change in (a) staff handling supplementary benefit and (b) all staff at the local office of his Department for the same period.

Mr. Major: Livingston is covered by two of the Department's offices, Edinburgh, West and Bathgate, but their boundaries are not conterminous with the boundary of the constituency.

Information on the number of individuals who claimed supplementary benefit is not available in the form requested.

Information that is available for the offices is as follows:

	Edinburgh, West	Bathgate
Number of new and repeat claims to supplementary benefits (including unsuccessful)
1979-80	12,579	13,571
1985-86	14,701	17,501
Percentage change	+16·9	+29·0
*Number of people receiving supplementary benefit
1979-80	5,563	6,520
1985-86	9,849	14,487
Percentage change in complement	+77·0	+122·2
Supplementary benefit staff	+44·4	+100·0
All staff	+8·0	+25·1

* Based on a 100 per cent. count of cases in action in February.

Direct comparisons between numbers of staff and claims are misleading as workloads vary considerably by type and duration of claim and the action that has to be taken. All these factors vary over time as a result of legislative, policy and procedural changes. Examples of such changes are the introduction of Housing Benefit and postal claim forms.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number of supplementary benefit recipients by each social security office nationally for the most recent date available.

Mr. Major: I am arranging for information about the number of people receiving supplementary benefit at 11 February 1986, the latest available figures for each social security office nationally, to be placed in the Library as soon as possible.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number of single payments awarded and the total amount paid out by each social security office for the most recent 52-week period available.

Mr. Newton: Information about the number of single payments awarded by each social security office, and the total amounts paid out, in the year ended 9 April 1985 is already in the Library. Later information for a 52-week period could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the latest figure available for the number of dependants of supplementary benefit recipients by claimant category (a) nationally, (b) for Scotland (c) for Strathclyde and (d) for Greenock and Port Glasgow.

Mr. Major: The table shows the latest available provisional estimates of the number of dependants of supplementary benefit recipients by claimant category nationally and for Scotland. These figures relate to the position in December 1984.

	Partners	Other dependants	Total
National
Over pension age	262,000	9,000	271,000
Unemployed	580,000	1,049,000	1,629,000
Others	244,000	975,000	1,219,000

Others	25,000	98,000	123,000

* Less than 500.

Source: December 1984 Annual Statistical Enquiry.

Similar information for Strathclyde and Greenock and Port Glasgow is not available.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the expected publication date of the supplementary benefit "Annual Statistical Enquiry" for 1984.

Mr. Major: The results from the December 1984 annual statistical inquiry into supplementary benefit are expected to be available in September. The bound volume of tables will be deposited at that time in the Library and they will be made generally available on application to the Department's leaflets unit.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the latest available information on the take-up of supplementary benefit, broken down by category of claimants, amount unclaimed weekly by category of claimant and overall amount annually estimated to be unclaimed.

Mr. Major: The most recently published information is for 1981 and is as follows:

Estimates of take-up of supplementary benefit for 1981

	Total likely to be entitled at any one time (000's)	Proportion receiving benefit at that time (per cent.)	Number eligible but not receiving benefit (000's)	Estimated benefit unclaimed (£ million per annum)	Average weekly amount unclaimed £
i. Pensioners	2,480	67	810	210	5·0
ii. Non-Pensioners* total	2,350	75	580	550	18·10
iii. Sick and Disabled	290	67	100	70	14·30
iv. Unemployed	1,580	75	400	410	19·60
v. One-parent families not included in (iii) and (iv)	400	88	50	40	15·30
Total for all groups	4,820	71	1,390	760	10·50

* This total is slightly greater than the sum of lines (iii), (iv) and (v) because it includes a small residual group of miscellaneous cases.

Notes:

1. Estimates of those with an unclaimed entitlement are based on DHSS analysis of income and other information recorded by respondents to the family expenditure survey (FES). The estimates of those in receipt are derived from the annual statistical inquiry of supplementary benefit claimants.
2. The estimates relate only to people living in private households: families and persons in institutions are not sampled in the FES.
3. Estimates are subject to statistical error; all figures are rounded to the nearest 10,000.
4. Calculation of entitlement to supplementary benefit is based on the appropriate scale rates—ordinary for allowances and long-term for pensioners—with no allowance for additional requirements, except where heating additions would be automatically provided on age grounds. Disregards of income are allowed under the normal rules.
5. FES participants are not asked about the amount of capital they have, only about income received from capital, and assumptions have to be made from this information about capital holdings.
6. No entitlement to supplementary benefit is assumed if the family would be financially better off claiming housing rebates.

(Information for 1983 will be published shortly.)

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take urgent action to ensure that supplementary benefit is paid without further delay to Mr. T. Williams of Rawsmarsh near Rotherham.

Mr. Major: A payment representing the full entitlement to benefit due was sent to Mr. T. Williams on 17 July 1986. I regret that it took so long to deal with this claim.

Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people claimed supplementary benefit in Sheffield, Heeley constituency in (a) 1979 and (b) 1985; what percentage change that represents; and what was the percentage change in (a) staff handling supplementary benefit and (b) all staff at the local offices of his Department for the same period.

Mr. Major: Sheffield, Heeley is covered by two of the Department's offices, Sheffield, south-east and Sheffield, south-west, but their boundaries are not conterminous with the boundary of the constituency.

Comprehensive figures are not available before 1982-83 and information on the number of individuals who claimed supplementary benefit is not available in the form requested.

Information that is available is as follows:

	Sheffield
	South-East	South-West
Number of new and repeat claims to supplementary benefit (including unsuccessful)
1982-83	13,810	24,653
1985-86	13,529	23,916
Percentage change	−2·0	−3·0
*Number of people receiving supplementary benefit
1982-83	12,782	14,147
1985-86	14,183	16,778
Percentage change	+11·0	+18·6
Percentage change in complement 1982-83—1985-86:
Supplementary benefit staff	+22·0	+8·7
All staff	+2·9	−4·7

* Based on a 100 per cent. count of cases in action at February.

Direct comparisons between numbers of staff and claims are misleading as workloads vary considerably by type and duration of claim and the action that has to be taken. All these factors vary over time as a result of legislative, policy and procedural changes. Examples of such changes are the introduction of housing benefit and postal claim forms.

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will state the total number of those of working age receiving supplementary benefit, and the percentage increase since May 1979.

Mr. Major: The latest information available is as follows:

	000s
May 1979	1,157
December 1985	2,960
Percentage increase	156

Deaf Persons

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assistance is available from his Department to the deaf or hard of hearing to provide them with or help them to obtain electronic equipment now available which enables such people to communicate by telephone.

Mr. Newton: The duties of a local authority under section 2 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970 can include the provision of help to a disabled person in obtaining a telephone and any special equipment necessary to enable him or her to use a telephone, provided the local authority is satisfied that such assistance is necessary to meet the needs of that disabled person. This Department and the Department of Trade and Industry have made funds available for the provision of a number of Vistel machines, by which typed messages can be relayed and shown on a visual display, in places where they can be used by people whose hearing is impaired.

Doctor-Patient Ratios

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the doctor to patient ratio in the area covered by the Staffordshire, Moorlands parliamentary constituency; and what is the comparable doctor to patient ratio in England and Wales.

Mr. Hayhoe: Manpower statistics cover staff working in hospitals and are collected at a particular point in time; but they do not show what activities within the hospital the staff are engaged upon—for example, whether they are providing treatment to in-patients, out-patients or accident and emergency patients. By contrast, activity statistics show the number of cases treated during the year in National Health Service hospitals divided into day cases, in-patient and out-patient cases (including accident and emergency cases). Any overall staff: patient ratio is therefore a crude measure and does not take into account varying factors such as age of patients and types or complexity of treatment given. It is, however, possible to give a ratio in terms of the population being served although these figures cannot be broken down on the basis of parliamentary constituencies. At 1 October 1985 the number of hospital and community health service doctors, measured in whole time equivalents, was 85·8 per 100,000 population for England and Wales and 78·5 per 100,000 population for the area covered by the West Midlands regional health authority. At the same date the number of patients on a general practitioner's list in England and Wales averaged 2,059 and 2,093 in Staffordshire.

If my hon. Friend wants more detailed local information about hospital doctors and general practitioners, he may wish to write to the chairmen of the West Midlands regional health authority and the Staffordshire family practitioner committee respectively who may be able to help him.

Hospital Admissions (Staffordshire)

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people were waiting to be admitted to hospitals in Staffordshire at the most recent count.

Mr. Whitney: The requested information is given in the table.

Number of persons on in-patient waiting list in NHS hospitals on 30 September 1985

District Health Authority	Total cases
Mid Staffordshire	2,173
North Staffordshire	10,635
South East Staffordshire	2,337

Drugs and Appliances

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the cost of drugs and appliances dispensed by chemists and appliance contractors under the National Health Service in the United Kingdom in each year since 1983.

Mr. Hayhoe: The costs, excluding fees and allowances paid for dispensing, are:

	£ million
1983	1,284·6
1984	1,344·2
1985	1,450·8

Hospital Beds (Staffordshire)

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many hospital beds there were in the Staffordshire, Moorlands parliamentary constituency in each of the past six years.

Mr. Whitney: I am sorry I cannot give my hon. Friend the information he seeks in precisely the form requested. The numbers of beds in the North Staffordshire district health authority, within which the Staffordshire Moorlands constituency is located, are given in the table.

North Staffordshire district health authority (formerly North Staffordshire health district)

Year	Average daily number of available beds
1980	3,499
1981	3,504
1982	3,448
1983	3,406
1984	3,358
1985*	3,315

* provisional.

Fluoride

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what published scientific evidence is available to his Department on the effects of the addition of fluoride to the domestic water supply on the incidence of tooth decay.

Mr. Whitney: Evidence from around the world has proved conclusively that water fluoridation reduces dental decay. In this country the evidence of the efficacy of fluoridation is equally well documented. A comprehensive review of the evidence from the United Kingdom and abroad is contained in "Fluorides in Caries Prevention" by Murray J. J. and Rugg-Gunn A. J. (1982).

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report details of hospital waiting lists for each specialty in the Burnley, Pendle and Rossendale district health authority area.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is as follows:

Number of cases on in-patient waiting list for admission to NHS hospitals in Burnley, Pendle and Rossendale district health authority at 30 September 1985

Specialty	Number
General medicine	28
Paediatrics	3
Dermatology	18
Rheumatology	5
General surgery	653
ENT	744
Traumatic and Orthopaedic	222
Ophthalmology	57
Urology	419
Oral surgery	39
Gynaecology	419
Mental handicap	8
Other specialist units	61
Total	2,676

Heart Operations

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many patients have been on waiting lists for coronary artery bypass operations for every year for the past 15 years.

Mr. Whitney: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member the information he seeks. It is not collected centrally. Information on waiting lists for admission to hospital is available centrally by the specialty of treatment and not by operation.

Housing Benefit

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people at the latest date for which information is available were receiving standard housing benefit where (i) the claimant was disabled and (ii) the claimant and partner were disabled.

Mr. Newton: This information is not collected centrally and, I regret, could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Single Payments

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much was spent on supplementary benefit single payments in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Newton: It is provisionally estimated that expenditure on single payments in 1985-86 was £335 million.

Source: Management returns for 12 months to 8 April 1986.

Glaucoma

Mr. Bright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many of those on the blind register in England and Wales have suffered from glaucoma.

Mr. Newton: Diagnostic information about people included on local authorities' registers of blind people is not held centrally. Information is, however, collected about the causes of blindness amongst people certified as blind for the first time. It is estimated that out of the persons certified as blind in England in 1980-81, the latest date for which information is available, some 14 per cent. —that is, about 1,600 persons—had the cause of their blindness certified as glaucoma alone or glaucoma with other conditions.

Passive Smoking

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what representations he has received concerning passive smoking;

(2) what medical evidence is available to him on the effects of passive smoking;

(3) what information he has on the cost to public funds of the Health Education Council's campaign on passive smoking.

Mr. Whitney: The available evidence on the effects on health of breathing other people's tobacco smoke is being reviewed by the independent scientific committee on smoking and health, which advises the Government, with a view to updating the committee's statement on the subject in its 1983 report. The Health Education Council is spending about £450,000 this year on a campaign which deals with the social as well as the health aspects of passive smoking. Since January the Department has received about 30 written representations on this subject.

Cigarette Advertising

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many complaints he has received about cigarette advertising alleged to be in breach of his last voluntary agreement with the tobacco industry; and what were the results of his investigations of these complaints.

Mr. Whitney: One hundred and sixty seven complaints were received during the course of the agreement. In 11 cases the agreement was found to have been contravened and corrective action was taken in respect of these.

Acute Surgery Waiting List (North-West)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the number of people on the waiting list for acute surgery in each health authority area in the north-west region.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is given in the table.

Number of persons on in-patient waiting lists for surgical specialties on 30 September 1985, North Western regional health authority

Health Services (London)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much is being spent on health services in the London area during the current year; how this compares with 1978-79; what is the projected expenditure on the same services in the next financial year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: Revenue expenditure on hospital and community health services by district and special health authorities in the greater London area was £990·3 million in 1978-79 and £1,943·8 million in 1984-85 (the latest year for which information is available centrally). This represents a cash increase of 96·3 per cent. and a real terms increase over and above general inflation of 10·4 per cent. The detail of cash allocations to district health authorities is a matter for regional health authorities. My hon. Friend may wish to approach the chairmen of the Thames regional health authorities and of the special health authorities for the London postgraduate teaching hospitals for further information relating to 1985-86 and 1986-87. The health authorities will not make firm plans for 1987-88 until the resources available nationally have been determined and allocations to regions have been announced towards the end of 1986.

Pharmacists

Mr. Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the current number of pharmacists in the National Health Service; how this has changed since 1983; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: At 30 September 1985, the latest date for which information is available, there were 2,830* registered hospital pharmacists directly employed by the National Health Service in England. The figure at 30 September 1983 was 2,790*.

* Figures are whole-time equivalents rounded to nearest ten.

London Lighthouse Project

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement about the continued funding by his Department of the London Lighthouse project for acquired immune deficiency syndrome patients.

Mr. Hayhoe: My Department has not been asked to provide financial support to this project.

Attendance Allowance

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average time taken between receipt of a claim for attendance allowance and the issue of an order book (a) when the allowance is awarded on the initial application and (b) when it is awarded after a review.

Mr. Newton: (a) Eight and a half weeks; and (b) fifteen and a half weeks.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people were receiving (a) the higher rate and (b) the lower rate of attendance allowance at the latest date for which figures are available; how these figures break down between (i) the standard age groups and (ii) the social security regions; and what are the rates per 1,000 of population both nationally and in each region.

Mr. Newton: The available information is in the following tables. I regret that information is not available to provide a regional breakdown of attendance allowance recipients.

District Health Authority Chairmen

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his answer of 8 April, Official Report, column 85, by what means the members of Parliament who were invited to make recommendations about the appointment of district health authority chairmen were selected; and how many from each party were contacted.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten) on 18 April 1985 at column 277, in which he invited Members of Parliament to submit to him nominations for district health authority chairmen.

Bronchitis and Emphysema

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he proposes to extend the classification of industrial diseases to include bronchitis and emphysema.

Mr. Newton: Where a claimant is awarded disablement benefit for pneumoconiosis, bronchitis or emphysema may also be taken into account in assessing the amount of benefit payable. The Industrial Injuries Advisory Council is currently considering whether bronchitis or emphysema should be prescribed as industrial diseases in their own right. We shall consider very carefully any recommendations which the council may make as a result of its investigation.

Nerve Stimulators

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received concerning the provision of transcutaneous nerve stimulators on long term loan by health authorities to chronic pain sufferers.

Mr. Whitney: During the last six months we have received three inquiries about the supply of transcutaneous nerve stimulators, one from an hon. Member, one from a health authority and one from the Royal Associaton for Disability and Rehabilitation.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidance his Department gives to health authorities concerning the provisions of transcutaneous nerve stimulators on long term loan to chronic pain sufferers.

Mr. Whitney: No specific guidance has been issued on the provision of transcutaneous nerve stimulators. An item of equipment such as a transcutaneous nerve stimulator may be loaned to a patient free of charge if it has been prescribed by a consultant, and if the health authority has decided to provide it from within its allocated resources.

Invalid Care Allowance

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in what form he proposes that the invalid care allowance will be paid to married women; and what is his estimate of the total cost of back-dating its payment to December 1984.

Mr. Newton: Current payments will be made by order book; arrears will be paid by means of a payable order. It is estimated that the total cost of paying invalid care allowance to married women in 1986-87, including arrears back to 22 December 1984 where appropriate, will be £125 million net.

Mrs. Enid Singer

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he hopes to answer the letter from the hon. Member for South Hams of 1 July about Mrs. Enid Singer, a constituent of the hon. Member.

Mr. Major: We are making inquiries into the points raised and I shall write to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Kidney Patients

Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the number of new cases per million population accepted for treatment for end stage renal failure in each of the regional health authorities for the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Whitney: According to information supplied by the European dialysis and transplant association registry, the numbers of new patients per million population accepted for treatment for end stage renal failure in 1984 and 1985 in each regional health authority are set out in the table; the figures for 1985 are provisional only:

	1984	*1985
Northern	40·6	45·2
Yorkshire	34·2	37·2
Trent	40·4	45·7
East Anglian	40·5	52·6
North-West Thames	30·6	40·0
North-East Thames	30·3	65·4
South-East Thames	47·5	57·8
South-West Thames	25·3	21·7
Wessex	27·9	24·6
Oxford	37·5	43·8
South-Western	32·6	42·6
West Midlands	26·3	37·3
Mersey	31·3	34·2
North-Western	31·5	42·5
England	33·8	42·4

* Provisional

The wide variation in the figures will be partially accounted for by the movement of patients across regional boundaries. The provisional data for 1985 suggest that most regional health authorities have already exceeded their targets of at least 40 new renal patients per million population to be accepted for treatment by 1987 which were announced by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten) in December 1984. These increases in the level of service provided for the treatment of end stage renal failure are very encouraging.

Data have also been received from the United Kingdom transplant service on the numbers of cadaveric transplant operations performed in the United Kingdom during the six months January to June 1986, which were as follows:

	Number	Percentage increase on previous six months
Kidneys	797	24
Hearts	103	6
(including heart/lung) Livers	56	27

These figures are also very encouraging; in all cases they are the highest ever half-yearly totals.

The Health Service staff whose efforts enabled these increases to be achieved are to be congratulated. However further increases are still needed. Over 3,000 people are still waiting for a kidney transplant, and only if more donors become available can more transplant operations be performed and the waiting list reduced.

Nurses

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many health authorities are having difficulty in recruiting nurses for high dependency areas such as intensive care units; whether such nurses are more difficult to recruit in London than elsewhere; what steps he is taking to encourage suitably qualified nurses to take up this work in areas where there is a shortage; and what effect difficulties in recruiting are having on the services provided by the hospitals which are affected.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that detailed information about nurse recruitment difficulties in high dependency areas and the effect they may be having on the services provided is not available centrally. However, I am aware of the results of a survey of a sample of health authorities conducted for the Review Body for Nursing Staff Midwives and Health Visitors which showed, that at 31 March 1985 about 5 per cent. of all whole-time equivalent funded posts for intensive care and theatre nursing staff were vacant for at least three months compared with the average of 2·5 per cent. for all nursing and midwifery staff. The total number of nursing staff employed in these areas of work however continue to increase—by 10·2 per cent. to 16,110 WTEs between September 1983 and September 1984 (the latest date for which such detail is available). Increases in these staff occurred in each region.

It is for individual health authorities to decide, in the light of local needs and priorities and the resources available to them, how many nurses they should employ who have received training in intensive care and theatre nursing and how many trainees they should second to meet those needs. Most regional health authorities have been asked to refine the manpower planning and training components of their strategic plans and in considering these the Department will pay particular attention to proposals for staff groups who may be in short supply.

There are particular problems in London regarding recruitment of nurses but these do not relate specifically to intensive therapy units and theatres. These difficulties are currently the subject of a review commissioned by the National Health Service Management Board.

Family Practitioner Services

Mr. Maples asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress has been made in reviewing the family practitioner services complaints procedure; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: A consultation document setting out our proposals for changes in the arrangements for the investigation of complaints about the family practitioner services in England and Wales will be published shortly and copies placed in the Library. These proposals will develop and expand those outlined in the Government's discussion document "Primary Health Care: An Agenda For Discussion" (Cmnd. 9771) which was published in April.

Radiation (Report)

Mr. Maples asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the committee on the medical aspects of radiation in the environment (COMARE) will complete its report on new information relating to discharges from Sellafield that has become available since publication of Sir Douglas Black's report.

Mr. Hayhoe: COMARE has now completed its report and it is being published today. I have arranged for copies to be placed in the Library and the Vote Office.

The committee concludes that it is impossible to exclude environmental radiation or indeed any other factor as a contributory cause of the cases of leukaemia observed at Seascale although they stress that there is no firm evidence for the existence of any causal relationship between environmental radiation and these leukaemias.

Although the committee expresses reservations about the adequacy and completeness of the available data and also about the conventional framework for estimating doses and risks, it concludes that the substance and essential conclusions of the Black advisory group report remain unchanged.

The Government are giving full and careful consideration to the report and will take any necessary action.

Alvada Kooken

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on how many previous occasions Alvada Kooken has been allowed out of Broadmoor on day trips; how many of the current total number of patients have been allowed out in such circumstances during the last five years; what criteria are used in determining whether patients should enjoy this facility; what degree of supervision is applied in such cases; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 27 June 1986, c. 356]: Before the outing to Southsea on 23 June, Miss Kooken went on two day trips in 1982, two in 1983, three in 1984 and one in 1985. I regret that information about day trips by patients from the hospital is not available prior to 1982. For the years since then, details are available only of the number of day trips and the numbers of patients who went on each. Some patients will, of course, have gone on more than one outing, and some other patients who went on outings in the past will now have left the hospital or died. The available information is as follows:

1982: 12 trips with a total of 171 patient places
1983: 12 trips with a total of 154 patient places
1984: 19 trips with a total of 271 patient places
1985: 8 trips with a total of 94 patient places
1986: 2 trips with a total of 35 patient places

(On 30 June 1986 there were 495 patients in Broadmoor Hospital.)

As regards the criteria applied in deciding whether patients should go on outings, factors considered include the likely therapeutic benefit to the patient in the context of his or her overall treatment programme and any possible risk to the public. The level of supervision varies according to the needs of the patient and the circumstances of the outing and is considered very carefully in each case.

Pneumoconiosis Panels

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the pneumoconiosis panels were set up; on whose recommendations and on what grounds; to whom they are responsible; if he will list their present membership; and who determines their membership and on what grounds.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1986, c. 414]: Panels of specially qualified medical practitioners known as pneumoconiosis medical panels were set up in 1948 by the then Minister of National Insurance. They replaced the silicosis medical boards which were established under the Workmen's Compensation Acts.

Panel members were appointed by the Minister to serve on pneumoconiosis medical boards (now special medical boards) to determine medical questions arising on claims under the industrial injuries scheme in connection with pneumoconiosis and certain other industrial chest diseases.

The panels were abolished in 1983. Their members were appointed by my right hon. Friend as specially qualified medical adjudicating practitioners to serve on special medical boards.

Medical practitioners appointed to serve on special medical boards are experienced in chest diseases and general medicine and have a wide experience of occupational chest diseases. The boards are statutory adjudicating authorities and are independent of the Department.

The names of all medical practitioners currently appointed to serve as special board members are as follows.

General Practitioners (Work Loads)

Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the effect of old people being discharged from hospitals into homes in the community on the work loads of general practitioners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 21 July 1986]: This is one of the many factors which the Doctors and Dentists Review Body takes into account each year in its assessment of general practitioners work load. Statistical evidence indicates that the average doctor is now caring for fewer patients aged 65 and over than he did in 1974.

Motor Neurone Disease

Mrs. Currie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what funding has been provided, both by central Government and others, for research into motor neurone disease, in each of the last five years for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: I have been asked to reply.

The Department's responsibilities for the support of scientific research are discharged by the research councils, who receive annual grants-in-aid from the science budget.

I understand from the Medical Research Council that details of its funding for research into motor neurone disease in each of the past five financial years are as follows:

	Research projects exclusively on MND	Research projects in which MND is a minor component
1981-82	154,408	736,404
1982-83	193,703	739,473
1983-84	174,302	833,321
1984-85	173,609	1,116,469
1985-86	219,235	953,168

In addition I understand that the Science and Engineering Research Council is funding some research which could be relevant to our understanding of MND. The council has allocated £90,981 to this work between the financial years 1983-84 and 1986-87; a year by year breakdown of this figure is not available.

Research work relevant to MND may also be taking place in universities and medical schools financed from the block grant to universities allocated for teaching and research on advice from the University Grants Committee. The voluntary charitable organisations may also be funding some work. Details are not available in either case.

Written Answers to Questions

Wednesday 23 July 1986

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Agriculture Improvement Scheme

Mr. Andy Stewart asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about grants for effluent disposal under the agriculture improvement scheme.

Mr. Jopling: Because of excessive expenditure on these grants, which has arisen particularly in Northern Ireland, I have decided, in agreement with the Secretaries of State for Northern Ireland, for Scotland and for Wales, to introduce a payment limitation system in Northern Ireland under which, until further notice, grants will only be paid there on effluent disposal investments to which farmers have already committed themselves by midnight tonight. In addition, the facility under which claims for grant on effluent disposal can be made on a standard cost basis under the Agricultural Improvement Scheme 1985 and the Agriculture Improvement Regulations 1985 is being withdrawn from midnight tonight throughout the United Kingdom.

This action will not affect the rate of grant available for eligible effluent disposal investments, which will remain at the level of 60 per cent. in the less-favoured areas and 30 per cent. elsewhere.

Pigmeat

Mr. Maclennan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has received from the British Veterinary Association concerning imported pigmeat products; and what response he has given.

Mr. Jopling: I have just received a letter from the British Veterinary Association about imported pigmeat products and will be replying to that as soon as possible.

Badgers

Mr. Bill Walker asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action he intends to take in response to Professor Dunnet's recommendation that the current practice of releasing lactating female badgers taken in control operations should be discontinued; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I fully understand the reasons which led Professor Dunnet to make his recommendation. Having taken the views of the consultative panel, we know that it accepts that on disease control grounds there is a strong case for its adoption. However, many panel members have expressed overriding reservations on ethical and humanitarian grounds about any change to existing policy. We know too that there is widespread public concern on this issue.

Having taken full account of these views, and after very careful consideration, we believe that, on balance, the existing policy is right and have decided that it should be continued. Thus, any lactating females taken between 1 February and 30 April will continue to be released as will any females taken after the end of April which are likely to have entirely dependent cubs.

Milk Marketing Board

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of the milk held by the Milk Marketing Board was allocated to the production of butter in each of the last five years; and what is the estimate for 1986.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 22 July 1986]: Utilisation of milk for butter in England and Wales, as a percentage of total sales off farms, was as follows:

Marketing year (April-March)	Percentage
1981-82	25
1982-83	31
1983-84	30
1984-85	27
1985-86	28
1986-87	n/a

Source: 1981-82 to 1984-85 Dairy Facts and Figures 1985. 1985-86 MMB estimate.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what price the Milk Marketing Board receives for supplying milk to dairies and for allocation to butter production, respectively, on a comparative basis.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 22 July 1986]: In May 1986, the last month for which prices have been finalised, the Milk Marketing Board received 19·894p per litre for milk sold for the liquid market, 13·513p per litre for milk sold to make Cheddar cheese and 13·793p per litre for milk sold to make butter and skimmed milk powder.

Irradiated Food

Mr. Freeson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what evidence there is of the effects, including those on vitamins A, B and C, of irradiation on the constituents of treated food.

Mr. Whitney: I have been asked to reply.

This and other questions about the nutritional, microbiological and toxicological aspects of food irradiation will be studied by Health and Agriculture Ministers when they formally consider the advice on these matters contained in the "Report on the Safety and Wholesomeness of Irradiated Foods" by the Advisory Committee on Irradiated and Novel Foods. As was announced on 10 April when the report was published, Ministers will also take into account written comments on the report from interested organisations and individuals, and these should be received by this Department by the end of this month.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Expenditure

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, further to his answer of 13 May, Official Report, columns 433-34, if he will publish in the Official Report (i) the purchasing power parities used in converting foreign currencies to sterling, (ii) the comparable parities for 1976, 1979 and 1985, (iii) the actual rates of exchange in 1983 and (iv) the basis of his calculations in cases where the information is for years prior to 1983.

Mr. Bob Dunn: The information on purchasing power parities and other data used in my revised answer of 12 June, at column 278, are given in the following table. The change in the consumer price index from the year stated in the table is used to inflate the unit costs quoted for that year to 1983 prices. The 1983 purchasing power parity is then applied to the revised unit costs to bring the various local currencies to a common basis, which allows for differences in national price levels. My reply of 2 July, at column 539, gives further details.

Examination Results

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the proportion of leavers from schools or colleges with two A-levels, three A-levels, no A-levels but five O-levels, one to four O-levels or CSE grade ones, and one or more graded results, in the relevant age bands at which the examinations are normally taken, in the years 1964-65, 1974-75 and 1984-85.

Mr. Dunn: Data in respect of leavers from maintained and independent schools are as follows:

School Leavers, England

[2]Other grades are defined as O-level grades D-E and CSE grades 2-5.

[3]Prior to 1975 O-level candidates were awarded either a pass grade or were deemed to have failed. Grades A-C—higher grades—are defined as equivalent to the former pass level.

Information on O-level/CSE attainments in FE establishments is not available centrally. However, the proportions of young people either leaving school or who were candidates at FE establishments achieving GCE A-level passes are given in the following table. These data are derived by reference to the 17-year-old population, a different denominator from that used in the preceding table.

Student Awards

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what the position of students from Gibraltar studying in the United Kingdom from 1 September 1986 will be for the purposes of fees and for mandatory and discretionary student awards.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: As I said in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) on 1 July, at column 475, from 1 September 1986 students who are nationals of other European Community countries and are studying in the United Kingdom on courses designated for mandatory awards purposes will have their fees paid by the Government if they satisfy the same or equivalent conditions for eligibility for mandatory awards and home fee status as are applied to United Kingdom students. Gibraltar is part of the European Community and is therefore included in these new fees arrangements. The position of students from Gibraltar for the purposes of mandatory and discretionary student awards is unchanged.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will provide a figure indicating the percentage distribution of parents of children participating in the assisted places scheme according to the contributory scales used by his Department for each year since the scheme's introduction.

Mr. Dunn: The information requested is as follows:

Relevant income bands (at 1985 prices)	Percentage distribution
	1982	1983	1984	1985
Up to £6,367	38·3	36·2	39·7	39·3

£10,081-£12,280	17·0	17·4	16·2	16·9
£12,281 upwards	7·9	7·3	8·3	8·9

The information was not collected for the first year of the scheme.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to the average income represented by fees paid by his Department under the assisted places scheme for those schools participating in the scheme for which the 60 per cent. requirement has been relaxed; if he will list in the Official Report the fee income to each participating school as a result of the scheme; and what percentage of each school's fee income this represents for 1985-86.

Mr. Dunn: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is (a) the amount of Government expenditure on the assisted places scheme for each year since its introduction at constant and outturn prices, (b) the percentage it represents of Government spending on schools and non-advanced further education, (c) the number of people covered by the scheme and (d) the proportion they represent within the maintained school and NAFE population.

Mr. Dunn: The information requested is as follows:

	Expenditure on assisted places Scheme (£ million financial year)		Percentage of Government spending on	Number of Assisted Pupils (academic year)	APS pupils as Percentage of maintained
	Constant Prices (84-85 base)	Outturn Prices	schools and NAFE		secondary school and NAFE population

Teachers (Pay)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a table showing the movement of the average of teachers' salaries against the retail prices index (a) from the implementation of the Houghton award to April 1979, (b) from the implementation of the Houghton award to April 1984, (c) from the implementation of the Houghton award to April 1986 or the most recent date for which information is available, including payments agreed by the Burnham committee since April 1985, (d) from April 1979 to April 1984 and (e) from April 1979 to April 1986 or the most recent date for which information is available including payments agreed by the Burnham committee since April 1985.

Mr. Chris Patten: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply my right hon. Friend gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson) on 17 July, at columns 576-77. The particular movements requested are:

		Percentage
(a) from the implementation of the Houghton award (24 May 1974) to April 1979	=	− 12
(b) from 24 May 1974 to 1 April 1984	=	− 4
(c) from 24 May 1974 to 1 April 1986	=	+ 1
(d) from 1 April 1979 to 1 April 1984	=	+ 10
(e) from 1 April 1979 to 1 April 1986	=	+ 15

Educational Needs (Appeals)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many appeals have been made to him under the provisions of sections 5 and 8, respectively, of the Education Act 1981, indicating how many of those appeals were allowed and, in the case of appeals under section 8, what action he took.

Mr. Dunn: Since its implementation on 1 April 1983, 56 appeals have been made under section 5(6) of the Education Act 1981. In two instances the local education authority was directed to reconsider its decision, and in 10 instances the authorities agreed to reconsider their decisions following informal discussions between officials. A decision on 11 cases has yet to be made and three cases have been withdrawn.

Sixty three appeals have been made to my right hon. Friend under the provision of section 8(6) of the Act. In 36 instances the statement of special educational need was confirmed; in 18 instances the Secretary of State amended the statement; eight cases are yet to be decided and one appeal was withdrawn.

University Revenue Accounts

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has on university revenue accounts accumulated surpluses or deficits.

Mr. Walden: Universities' accounting practices vary. Information is derived from their published accounts for particular purposes, as necessary.

Royal Greenwich Observatory

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science who was initially responsible for suggesting that the Royal Greenwich Observatory move from Herstmonceaux.

Mr. Walden: The Science and Engineering Research Council.

University Departments (Classification)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether, in the recent University Grants Committee's exercise in classifying departments on a basis of merit any consideration was given to the scope for rationalisation in the final classification.

Mr. Walden: The University Grants Committee has considered, and is continuing to consider, the scope for the rationalisation of university departments. Such considerations did not, however, affect the committee's judgments about the standard of departments' research.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Aid Loans

Mr. Hawksley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which Commonwealth countries are receiving aid loans from the United Kingdom in the current year; what is the value of aid or loans to each country; and how much they have received in each of the last five years.

Mr. Eggar: The information is contained in:

(a) Tables 1 and 2 of the Supply Estimates for Overseas Aid for 1986-87, which give details of financial loans and grants to each developing country; and

(b) "British Aid Statistics 1980-84", which provides the latest information available for previous years.

Copies of both these publications are available in the House of Commons Library. The 1986 edition of "British Aid Statistics", containing expenditure figures for 1985, is expected to be published by the end of August.

International Finance Corporation

Mr. Temple-Morris asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what provision he is making to pay the subscriptions due to the International Finance Corporation which are due (a) before 31 July and (b) from 1 August.

Mr. Eggar: Parliament approved these payments, totalling US$12·2 million, under the International Finance Corporation (1985 General Capital Increase) Order on 16 July. Financial provision will be sought in a Winter Supplementary Estimate for the Overseas Aid Vote. Pending that vote, urgent expenditure estimated at about £8·25 million will be met by repayable advances from the Contingencies Fund.

Uganda

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the level of aid by Her Majesty's Government to Uganda in each of the past three years.

Mr. Eggar: British gross bilateral aid to Uganda was £6·1 million in 1983; £7·1 million in 1984; and £9·2 million in 1985.

ODA (Resources)

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will provide details of budgetary resources made available in constant terms for each division within the Overseas Development Administration for the years 1977, 1979, 1981, 1983 and 1985.

Mr. Eggar: Information about administrative resources was not collected in the form requested before 1983 and has since been recorded by financial years. Administrative resources, in 1984-85 cash terms, available to divisions in 1983-84 and 1984-85 were:

Division	1983-84 £ million	1984-85 £ million
Africa	2·4	2·4
Asia and the Oceans	3·5	3·6
Functional	2·8	2·9
Scientific Units	10·8	10·8
International	1·3	1·3
Overseas Manpower	6·8	*5·9
Finance and Economic Services	3·6	3·8
Policy and Organisation	7·9	7·4
	39·1	38·1

* Underspend due to a strike by the staff who make payments of overseas service pensions.

The distribution of resources by region and function under the official aid programme is given in the annual publication "British Aid Statistics", a copy of which is available in the House of Commons Library.

Multilateral Development Agencies

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government support a zero growth budget policy for the forestry, agriculture and environment/natural resources offices of those multilateral development agencies in which the United Kingdom has an active interest.

Mr. Eggar: We favour zero real growth in the overall budgets of those United Nations specialised agencies which are financed by assessed contributions, and generally in the administrative budgets of other multilateral agencies. We expect the pattern of expenditure within these budgets to reflect current priorities.

Development Aid Projects

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what resources are made available through the Overseas Development Administration for environmental impact assessment of development aid projects.

Mr. Eggar: The Overseas Development Administration assesses the environmental effects of all British aid activities through either the work of its own staff or use of outside consultants. The resources involved could be quantified only at disproportionate cost.

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give the numbers, professional qualifications and positions of all staff employed, either as consultants or on a permanent basis, by the Overseas Development Administration to assess and advise on the environmental effects of proposed multilateral and bilateral development projects in the forestry, agriculture and natural resource sectors for the years 1977, 1979, 1981, 1983 and 1985.

Mr. Eggar: It is the responsibility of all staff in the Overseas Development Administration to ensure that its aid activities are environmentally sound. In practice this is achieved by the administrative staff, assisted by the professional renewable natural resources and engineering advisers. Where necessary, specialist advice is sought either from the ODA scientific units, associated bodies, other academic and research institutions or private sector consultants. In the circumstances, it is not practicable to specify or list the ODA staff resources involved. Responsibility for the assessment of multilateral aid projects rests with the staff of the multilateral institutions concerned. As a member of these institutions we seek to ensure that such assessments are properly done and fully taken into account.

Brazil

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make available the World Bank's staff appraisal reports for all projects covered by the electric power sector loan requested by Brazil.

Mr. Eggar: No. World Bank staff appraisal reports are provided to us on a restricted basis.

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the United Kingdom executive director to the World Bank was instructed to support the electric power sector loan requested by Brazil on 19 June.

Mr. Eggar: It is not our practice to disclose the instructions which we give to our executive director in the Bank.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Beer Containers

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will introduce legislation to require all bulk beer containers to be stamped with their empty weight; and if he will take steps to introduce statutory controls regarding minimum quantities included in those bulk beer containers;

(2) if he will introduce legislation to require brewers to have the gross weight, to include the weight of the invoiced quantity of beer, and the net weight of the container, including spile, clearly stamped on all containers of draught beer.

Mr. Howard: I have no plans to introduce legislation. I believe that this is very much a practical problem to be resolved through voluntary arrangements within the trade which could provide a readier and more flexible means of resolving or avoiding disputes.

I therefore welcome the Brewers Society initiative in seeking to reach agreement with the National Union of Licensed Victuallers on a proposed code of practice which would ensure that licensees receive detailed statements of the quantities of beer delivered.

Plessey/GEC

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what assessment his Department has made of the potential job losses among suppliers to the United Kingdom defence electronic equipment industry which could result from the proposed takeover of the Plessey company by GEC; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what assessment he has made of the impact on the United Kingdom's technological base of the proposed takeover of the Plessey company by GEC;

(3) what assessment he has made of the effects on small businesses of the proposed merger of Plessey and GEC;

(4) what share of the market for private telephone exchanges and transmission equipment is currently held by the Plessey company and GEC.

Mr. Howard: My right hon. Friend is considering the report of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission on this merger. In assessing the impact on the public interest of the proposed merger between GEC and Plessey the Commission has a duty to take into account all matters which it considers to be relevant in the circumstances. My right hon. Friend will make an announcement about the report as soon as is practicable.

Mr. John Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make it his policy to make a statement on the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's investigation of the proposed take-over of Plessey plc by General Electric Company plc before 25 July.

Mr. Howard: My right hon. Friend will announce the outcome of the MMC's investigation into the proposed merger of GEC and Plessey, and publish the MMC's report, as soon as practicable.

Grosvenor Management Services (Scotland)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will undertake an investigation under the provisions of the Companies Acts, into the affairs of Grosvenor Management Services (Scotland) Ltd.; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: I know of no reason for doing so, but shall consider any information the hon. Member may have about this company.

Aircraft Noise

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has regarding new aircraft and engine developments under consideration by various manufacturers which are expected to generate noise levels which meet the requirements of the International Civil Aviation Organisation, chapter 3, but do not match the noise levels of the majority of aircraft and engine types currently in production; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: Annex 16 to the Convention on International Civil Aviation (ICAO Annex 16) applies to complete aircraft and not to engines in isolation. The majority of the subsonic jet types now in production comply with the standards of chapter 3 of annex 16. Any subsonic civil jet aeroplane or large propeller-driven aeroplane currently under development will have to meet these same standards. Until these have flown it is not possible to compare their noise levels with those of other aircraft.

Wind-powered Shipping

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will allocate part of the energy and research and development annual expenditure to conduct research into wind-powered shipping.

Mr. Butcher: Over £200,000 has been provided to industry since 1983 under the Department of Trade and Industry's support for innovation scheme towards the cost of projects relating to the use of wind in ship propulsion. A United Kingdom device which has received such support has recently commenced sea trials on a vessel operated by Stephenson Clarke Shipping. Wind assistance is a promising approach to greater fuel efficiency. Support for further projects, as part of the efficient ship programme, will be considered if appropriate proposals are presented to the Department.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Northern Ireland (Trials)

Mr. McNamara asked the Attorney-General if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the number of persons in Northern Ireland released after the retraction of alleged accomplice witness evidence, the numbers of persons acquitted in such trials where evidence was given in court by an accomplice witness and the number of persons whose convictions were quashed on appeal for the first six months of the current year.

The Attorney-General: During the period 1 January 1986 to 30 June 1986 there have been no trials in Northern Ireland in which evidence was given by an accomplice witness. During the same period the convictions of two persons tried in 1983 were quashed on appeal to the Court of Appeal. During the same period no cases were received in the Department of the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland in which an alleged accomplice subsequently declined to give evidence for the Crown.

Mr. McNamara asked the Attorney-General if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the number of persons tried on indictment for scheduled offences and the total number of persons pleading guilty or convicted in such trials for the first six months of the current year in Northern Ireland.

The Attorney-General: The number of persons tried on indictment for scheduled offences in Northern Ireland during the period 1 January 1986 and 30 June 1986 is as follows:

	Number
Number of persons tried	331
Number of persons pleading guilty	295
Number of persons convicted on plea of not guilty	23

Mr. McNamara asked the Attorney-General if he will publish a table in the Official Report showing the number of trials in Northern Ireland involving evidence given in court by an accomplice witness, the number of persons tried in such trials, together with the number of persons pleading guilty to, or convicted of, scheduled offences where evidence was given in court by an accomplice witness and the number of persons found guilty of or pleading guilty to, scheduled offences on the basis of accomplice witness evidence, but where the accomplice witness may not have given evidence in court, for the first six months of the current year.

The Attorney-General: During the period 1 January 1986 and 30 June 1986 there have been no trials in Northern Ireland where evidence has been given by an accomplice witness. There is no comprehensive record of, and it is not now feasible to identify without disproportionate cost, the nature of the evidence which was before the court in relation to individuals. There is no record of any person found guilty of or pleading guilty to scheduled offences on the basis of accomplice witness evidence where the accomplice witness has not given evidence in court.

Plastic Bullets

Mr. McNamara asked the Attorney-General how many cases in the first six months of the current year involving persons injured by plastic bullets in Northern Ireland have been considered by the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland; and what action was taken in each case.

The Attorney-General: Figures for cases considered between 1 January 1986 and 30 June 1986 by the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland involving persons killed or injured by the alleged use of baton rounds are as follows:

	Number
Cases	7
Persons injured	7
Persons killed	1
Prosecutions directed	0
No prosecution directed	4

In two cases a final direction pends the outcome of other proceedings or the submission to the Director of additional evidence. In one case consideration of the evidence has not been completed.

Northern Ireland (Scheduled Offences)

Mr. McNamara asked the Attorney-General how many cases concerning scheduled offences have been referred to the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal; and in how many of these referred cases the original conviction has been (a) quashed and (b) upheld, respectively, in the first six months of the current year.

The Attorney-General: During the first six months of 1986 there were 13 appeals to the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal dealt with in court against conviction for scheduled offences. The original conviction was quashed in two cases and upheld in 11 cases.

Legal Aid

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Attorney-General, for the years from 1970 to date, how many applications were made for legal aid in order to bring proceedings in respect of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970; and in how many of those cases legal aid was granted.

The Attorney-General: This information is not available. Legal aid statistics do not normally record the legislation in respect of which individual applications for legal aid are made.

Prosecutions (Criteria)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Attorney-General what criteria he uses in determining in cases in which he or the Director of Public Prosecutions has decided not to bring a prosecution and where a private prosecution is subsequently brought, whether (a) to take that prosecution over and (b) to enter a nolle prosequi; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The power to intervene and assume responsibility for the conduct of a prosecution instituted by a person in a private capacity is vested by section 4 of the Prosecution of Offences Act 1979 (section 6 of the Prosecution of Offences Act 1985 in those areas where it has been implemented) in the Director of Public Prosecutions. The criteria which he adopts in exercising that power were set out in the reply by my right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General to the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) on 28 October 1985, at column 297. His policy is the same irrespective of whether he has himself previously decided not to prosecute. In considering whether to intervene he will have regard to any fresh evidence which may have emerged or new factors which may have arisen since the original decision was taken.

The power to direct the entry of a nolle prosequi is vested in me alone and not in the Director of Public Prosecutions. It is available only in relation to proceedings on indictment. I exercise the power sparingly in relation to cases where, having regard to all the circumstances, it appears that the public interest would best be served by discontinuing proceedings and there is no other suitable way of doing so. My approach is the same whether the application for a nolle prosequi relates to a private prosecution or one carried on by a public authority.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Dubs asked the Paymaster General what were the numbers of persons unemployed by age groups in the Wandsworth area for each year since 1979.

Mr. Lang: The following information is in the Library. The table shows the numbers of unemployed claimants by age groups in the London borough of Wandsworth for April of each year from 1984 to 1986. The comparison is affected by the change in the compilation of unemployment statistics in March 1986. Statistics of unemployment for London boroughs are derived from the new ward-based system and are available only from June 1983.

60 and over	401	431	449
Total	15,622	16,663	16,592

Mr. Barron asked the Paymaster General if he will give, for each parliamentary constituency and local authority district, the level and rate of unemployment in June 1979 and in each December and June subsequently on a consistent basis.

Mr. Lang: The information requested is not available, since statistics of unemployment for parliamentary constituencies and local authority districts are derived from the new ward-based system and are available only from June 1983 and unemployment rates are not calculated for areas smaller than travel-to-work areas.

The actual numbers of unemployed claimants in parliamentary constituencies and local authority districts in Great Britain for each month from 1983 are available in the Library, although comparisons over the period will be affected by the Budget provisions (which meant that certain older men, mainly aged 60 years or over, no longer need to sign on at unemployment benefit offices in order to obtain national insurance credits of the long-term rate of supplementary benefit) and also by the change in the compilation of the unemployment statistics in March 1986.

Self-Employment

Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General what are the latest figures available for the number of self-employed people in the Burnley travel-to-work area; and what was the 1979 comparative figure.

Mr. Lang: Information of the type requested is available only from the decennial census of population. The 1981 census identified 3,521 self-employed persons resident in the Burnley travel-to-work area.

New Businesses

Mr. Sayeed asked the Paymaster General (1) what are the latest figures available for the number of new businesses registered in Bristol, East constituency since 1979;

(2) what has been the net change in the number of new businesses in Bristol, East between 1979 and 1983.

Mr. Trippier: I regret that this information is not available.

English Tourist Board

Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General what level of funding is provided by his Department for the English Tourist Board; and what percentage this represents of its budget.

Mr. Trippier: The ETB will receive £10·3 million by way of grant-in-aid to cover promotional and administrative expenses in 1986-87. Around £4·3 million is expected to be raised from other sources and grant-in-aid will therefore represent around 70 per cent. of its total budget. In addition, £9·4 million of Government funding will be made available in 1986-87 for the selective financial assistance scheme operated by the ETB under section 4 of the Development of Tourism Act 1969.

WALES

Polytechnic of Wales (Student-Teacher Ratio)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has on the student-teacher ratio in the Polytechnic of Wales, Treforest, in each of the last five years.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information, derived from the annual monitoring survey, is in the following table:

Student: staff ratios

	Ratios
1980-81	8·8
1981-82	10·5
1982-83	11·5
1983-84	12·0
1984-85	12·2

Welsh Development Agency

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will consider introducing legislation giving the Welsh Development Agency similar powers and responsibilities in the field of economic and social development as those at present enjoyed by Mid-Wales Development.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have no plans to introduce legislation extending the range of the Welsh Development Agency's activities.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate of income for the Welsh Development Agency has been made by his Department arising out of the sale of assets during the current financial year; and what estimates have been made for such income for the next three years.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The target level of receipts from the sale of agency assets in the current financial year is £15 million. Sales targets for later years have yet to be determined.

Welsh-speaking Teachers

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what steps are being taken by the Welsh Office to meet the shortages of Welsh-speaking teachers highlighted in the report on the curriculum review recently published by his Department.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Paragraph 30 of the report "Local Authority Reviews of the School Curriculum in Wales" states:

"Particularly at a time when rolls are falling and substantial numbers of schools are undergoing organisational change the Government believes that positive action is needed by LEAs to redeploy teachers as appropriate and to allow for suitable in-service training".

Welsh language teaching is one of the national priority areas identified by the Welsh Office under its specific grant arrangements for in-service teacher training. Our officials are exploring with officers of each LEA how these grant arrangements could be used to help authorities make fuller use of the substantial number of Welsh-speaking teachers who are currently teaching only through the medium of English.

Measures are also under consideration to encourage more recruits into initial teacher training and in Wales particular attention is being given to recruiting Welsh speakers. The consultative document recently published by my right hon. Friends "Action on Teacher Supply in Mathematics, Physics and Technology" contains much that is relevant to the Welsh medium situation and I anticipate receiving some helpful and constructive comments.

Planning Permissions (Review)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will write to every local housing authority in Wales to ask them to review all the existing unimplemented planning permissions in their areas and to discuss with representatives of elderly persons, disabled persons, single homeless persons, the house building industry, social service departments and land owners the content of this review with a view to planning the construction of new houses, sheltered houses and flats to meet the needs of these people and to report back to him by 31 December.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Local authorities have already been asked to submit housing strategy and investment programmes for the next financial year based on their assessments of housing need. Copies of the programmes will, as usual, be placed in the House of Commons Library as soon as possible after the recess.

Sheep and Lamb (Contamination)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will take steps to amend the restrictions on the movement of sheep and lambs in Gwynedd currently in force as a result of the high radiation levels detected earlier to permit their movement to the North Wales Show at Caernarfon on 31 July; whether, if the relevant radiation levels have not by then dropped sufficiently to permit a general lifting of the restrictions on the relevant animals, he will exempt from the restrictions movements of animals direct to the show and subsequently direct back to the original farms; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The part of Gwynedd from which I announced the removal of restrictions on 17 July included the site of the North Wales Show at Caernarfon. For those parts of north Wales where restrictions still apply, a consent to move sheep for show purposes subject to their return to the original farm may be obtained from the appropriate divisional office of my Department.

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales how radiation contaminated lamb carcases have been disposed of in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The carcases of sheep slaughtered for sampling purposes in the designated areas of north Wales have in most cases been buried on the farm from which they were taken. However, during a period of intensive sampling in Clwyd a number of carcases were disposed of by turning them into fertiliser. I am satisfied that this was a safe means of disposal.

PRIME MINISTER

Chequers and No 10 Downing Street

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Prime Minister (1) what was the total separately identifiable cost of maintaining and running Chequers from 1979 to 1985; and what is the estimated increase for 1986 and 1987;

(2) what was the total separately identifiable cost of maintaining and running No. 10 Downing street from 1979 to 1985; and what steps she intends to take to curb future increases in this expenditure.

The Prime Minister: Since 1979 there have been a number of developments which have affected how the costs of Downing street are assessed, including:

— Abolition of the CPRS in 1983, and the absorption of some of its staff within the No. 10 Policy Unit;

— Introduction of charging for buildings and services by the PSA in 1983-84;

— Introduction of charging for Service personnel at Chequers by the MOD in 1984-85;

— Introduction of charging for aircraft by the Ministry of Defence in 1981-82; — and changes in the allocation of charges for the Government Car Service in 1984-85.

Column (a) represents the cost of Downing street and Chequers, excluding the grant in aid to the Chequers Trust, reflecting those changes. Column (b) gives the grant in aid to the Chequers Trust. Column (c) gives the total actual costs on a consistent basis excluding the effects of the changes referred to as far as it is possible to do so. Column (d) gives these costs at constant 1984-85 prices.

Billing delays prevent some costs from being shown in the financial year in which the goods and services were provided. The figures therefore do not necessarily reflect when the expenditure was actually incurred.

The 1986-87 grant-in-aid to the Chequers Trust is estimated at £224,000. All expenditure at 10 Downing street and Chequers is scrutinised rigorously to ensure that it is at the minimum level commensurate with the effective and efficient discharge of the responsibilities of my Office.

The cost given in column (a) for 1984-85 has been revised upward by £139,000 since I gave my answer to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), Official Report 9 April, columns 112-13, in the light of fresh information about the precise allocation of costs.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prison Department Statistics

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average daily population of persons detained in prison department establishments under Immigration Act powers during 1985.

Mr. Waddington: In 1985 the average population of persons detained under the Immigration Act 1971 in prison department establishments in England and Wales was 104.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average length of time spent in prison department establishments for persons detained under Immigration Act powers during 1985.

Mr. Waddington: The average period of detention in prison department establishments in England and Wales of persons initially received under the Immigration Act 1971 powers who were discharged in 1985 was about four weeks.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will give a breakdown by individual nationality of persons detained in prison department establishments under Immigration Act powers during 1985.

Mr. Waddington: The readily available information is given in the following table; the collection of information on nationality is not yet completely satisfactory.

Prison Officers (Murder)

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prison officers have been murdered in the course of duty in each of the last five years.

Mr. Mellor: In England and Wales, none in the years 1976 to 1985.

Young Persons (Convictions)

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons under 18 years of age were convicted of acts punishable under the Criminal Damage Act 1971 in the past three years.

Mr. Mellor: The readily available information relates to persons aged under 17 found guilty of offences of criminal damage. These figures include a very small number of offences under Acts other than the Criminal Damage Act 1971. The figures are published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables, Volume 4" (for 1984 in table S4.1(A) under offence classifications 56-59 and table S4.1(B) under offence classification 149, and in the corresponding tables for earlier years). Corresponding information for 1985 is not yet available.

Custodial Sentences

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of (a) males and (b) females are sentenced to custody by the time they reach the ages of 18 and 21 years, respectively.

Mr. Mellor: An estimate is available only for those born in 1953 and 1958 from the sample study of their convictions, results of which were published in Home Office statistical bulletin issue 7/85. Just over 2 per cent. of males and less than 0·1 per cent. of females had been sentenced to custody by the age of 18, and about 4 per cent. of males and 0·1 per cent. of females by the age of 21.

Police Officers (Criminal Charges)

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many criminal charges were brought against members of the police force in each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Giles Shaw: This information is not available. Statistics relating to the numbers of police officers convicted of criminal offences is contained in the annual reports of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary and of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

Police Officers (Murders)

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers in England and Wales have been murdered in the course of duty during each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Mellor: In a case of homicide it is not possible in the absence of a court decision to distinguish between offences of murder and manslaughter. The available information is given in the following table.

Intercontinental Hotel

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the nature of the operation on 20 June at the Intercontinental hotel, Hyde Park Corner, London W1; how many police officers and immigration officers were involved and of what ranks; how many people and of what nationalities were (a) interviewed and (b) detained in the operation; for how long and where; and with regard to what suspected or alleged breaches of immigration control these people were interviewed or charged.

Mr. Waddington: This was a major joint operation specifically planned to investigate suspected offences under the immigration laws. The numbers and ranks of police and immigration officers who visited the hotel were:

Police
1 Chief Superintendent
1 Sergeant
13 Constables

Immigration Service
1 Deputy Chief Inspector
1 Inspector
1 Chief Immigration Officer
7 Immigration Officers

A total of 27 people were interviewed (12 Ghanaians, 9 Nigerians, 2 Ugandans, 1 Sri Lankan, 1 Bangladeshi, 1 French and 1 British). Seventeen people were arrested and taken to Vine street police station with the following results:

Seven were judged to be illegal entrants (3 Ghanaians and 4 Nigerians);
Four were charged with working in breach of conditions (2 Ghanaians and 2 Nigerians);
Three were formally cautioned for working in breach of conditions (2 Ghanaians and 1 Nigerian); and Three were found not to be in breach of the immigration laws (1 British citizen, 1 Ghanaian and 1 Nigerian).

The seven illegal entrants who had been detected at the hotel, and who were taken initially to the police station, were all transferred to the Harmondsworth detention centre during the evening of 20 June. Three remained there until their removal or voluntary departure from the United Kingdom, whilst the other four were transferred to Latchmere house remand centre on 22 June (in three cases transfer was via the Queen's building detention centre). The total periods spent in detention in these cases were: 4, 8, 11, 12, 19, 26 and 32 days respectively.

In the other cases the periods spent in custody, all at Vine street police station, were:

4 hours or less: 1
Over 4 but under 6 hours: 2
Over 6 but under 9 hours: 2
Over 9 but under 15 hours: 5

This operation was conducted in accordance with the recommendations of Home Office circular 131-1980, of which a copy was placed in the Library in December 1980.

Immigration

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, of those detected as illegal entrants in each of the last five quarters, how many are alleged to have entered (a) by avoiding immigration controls, (b) by concealment of material facts from an immigration officer,

(c) by deceiving an immigration officer, (d) by concealment or deception by a third party and (e) on a false passport or not in their correct identity, by nationality.

Mr. Waddington: Some of the information requested could be furnished only at disproportionate cost. The number of illegal entrants detected in the various periods are as below. Categories (b) and (c) cannot be separately distinguished.

	Category	Number
1st Quarter 1985	(a)	26
	(b) + (c)	186

	(e)	61
1st Quarter 1986	(a)	37
	(b) + (c)	298
	(d)	0

Citizenship

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for British citizenship under section 4(5) of the British Nationality Act 1981 have been (a) granted, (b) refused and (c) not yet decided.

Mr. Waddington: So far, one application has been granted, two have been refused and 479 are outstanding.

Criminal Injuries Compensation Board

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the outcome of requests made for supplementary grants to the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board in each year from 1978-79 to 1985-86.

Mr. Mellor: Under the terms of the scheme the board is solely responsible for deciding what compensation should be paid in individual cases. The board is financed by grant-in-aid which is paid periodically as necessary. The board notifies the Home Office at intervals what money is required to meet expenditure on the scheme. Estimates of the provision required to meet forthcoming expenditure are submitted annually to Parliament. In years when the board's expenditure has seemed likely to exceed the budget estimate, a supplementary estimate has always been sought.

Potassium Iodide

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether stocks of potassium iodide are kept at police stations in the vicinity of Bradwell nuclear power station in Essex and at police stations in other parts of the United Kingdom where there are nuclear power stations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Emergency plans for civil nuclear installations include the provision of potassium iodate tablets. Where these tablets are held depends on local circumstances. At Bradwell they are held at the site. In some other areas they are kept at police stations.

Crime Statistics (Kent)

Mr. Couchman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Kent as to progress with inquiries into allegations of malpractice regarding the compilation of crime clear-up statistics for Kent.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No. The allegations are being investigated by a commander of the Metropolitan police under the supervision of the Police Complaints Authority.

It will be open to the Police Complaints Authority to draw my attention to any matters of a general nature arising from the investigation into Constable Walker's allegations. On the separate, but related, point of the system for the write-off of crimes, in order to improve our understanding of how offences are cleared up the Home Office has recently introduced a return which separates offences cleared up as a result of interviews with convicted prisoners from other offences cleared up without proceedings or the administration of a caution.

Rape

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what actions have been undertaken as a result of the recommendations put forth by the Women's National Commission regarding under-reporting of rape;

(2) What guidelines have been issued to chief constables concerning the creation of victim examination suites for victims of rape and sexual assault since December 1985; and what plans there are for further guidance;

(3) if he will make it his policy to introduce a national programme for training of police in rape counselling techniques.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We are consulting the police about those recommendations of the report "Violence Against Women" issued by the Women's National Commission which concern police procedures and training. We hope to issue guidance on all these recommenations, including those on facilities for examining rape victims and on the reporting of allegations of rape, in the autumn. Copies will be placed in the Library.

Buses (Westminster Bridge)

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the policy of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis towards bringing prosecutions against tourist bus operators whose vehicles have been parked in bus lanes on Westminster bridge.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner informs me that tourist coaches stop on the west side of Westminster bridge to enable passengers to alight and photograph the Houses of Parliament. No bus lane operates here, and the waiting restrictions contain exemptions for coaches setting down or picking up passengers. The police take enforcement action where the waiting restrictions are contravened.

Civil Defence

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what expenditure levels he has determined in respect of 1987-88 for the joint police and fire and civil defence authorities in the metropolitan areas and the London Fire and Civil Defence Authority.

Mr. Hurd: For these authorities, which under the Local Government Act 1985 are, for three years, deemed to have been designated under section 2 of the Rates Act 1984, I have determined expenditure levels as follows:

Police

	£ million
Greater Manchester	89·121
Merseyside	62·047
South Yorkshire	36·726
West Midlands	81·402
West Yorkshire	66·117
Northumbria	45·542

Fire and Civil Defence

	Fire and civil defence £ million	Fire £ million	Civil defence £ million
Greater Manchester	43·312	43·226	0·086
Merseyside	29·284	29·201	0·083
South Yorkshire	20·681	20·606	0·075
Tyne and Wear	20·989	20·915	0·074
West Yorkshire	33·788	33·702	0·086
West Midlands	39·523	39·436	0·087
London	156·348	156·020	0·328

The above figures are net of receipts and pension contributions, and, for police and civil defence, of specific grant. For police, the figures assume that police grant in 1987-88 will remain at 51 per cent.

Formal notice of their expenditure levels has today been sent to each of the authorities together with advice on the procedure for applying for redetermination of the expenditure levels.

Terrorism

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the number of deaths which have occurred in Great Britain in the first six months of the current year connected with present civil unrest in Northern Ireland; and how many of those deaths were caused by action taken by the police and each of the known paramilitary groups.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Provisional information is that there were no such deaths in England and Wales in the first six months of 1986.

Mr. NcNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons detained under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Acts in each of the police areas of Metropolitan London, Dumfries and Galloway and Merseyside have been charged with offences under the Acts or under other Acts, separately, for the first six months of the current year.

Mr. Mellor: Information on detentions in the three police force areas specified is published quarterly in Home Office statistical bulletins (table 3 of issue 13/86 gives figures up to the first quarter of 1986; figures for the second quarter will be published shortly). In the first quarter of 1986, five persons detained in Dumfries and Galloway were charged with offences under the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1984 and one person detained in the Metropolitan police district was charged only with an offence under other legislation.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons were remanded in custody before trial for terrorist-type offences in the first six months of the current year.

Mr. Mellor: The only information which is readily available relates to prisoners who are now in prison custody in category A, and does not cover prisoners who have been released or downgraded.

Three such prisoners were first received in custody in the first six months of 1986.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average number of days spent on remand by those remanded in custody for terrorist-type offences in the first six months of the current year with regard to cases now completed in England and Wales and the number of bail applications refused, respectively.

Mr. Mellor: The only information which is readily available relates to prisoners who are now in prison custody in category A. It does not cover prisoners who have been released or downgraded.

None of the cases of those first remanded during the first six months of 1986 have been completed. The average number of days spent on remand by prisoners whose cases were completed in the first six months of 1986 was 370. Ten applications for bail are recorded; all were refused.

Prisoners (Statistics)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners in British jails give as their place of domicile (a) the Republic of Ireland and (b) Northern Ireland; and, in each case, how many of these prisoners are serving sentences for terrorist-type offences as at 30 June.

Mr. Mellor: The information which is readily available centrally relates to prisoners' place of birth and to those terrorist-type prisoners who are held in category A. On 31 May 1986, 670 inmates of prison department establishments in England and Wales were recorded as born in the Republic of Ireland and about 330 in Northern Ireland. Of those, 13 born in the Republic of Ireland and 33 born in Northern Ireland had been convicted of terrorist-type offences and were held in category A.

Prisoners (Transfers)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners were transferred from (a) England and Wales to Northern Ireland and (b) from Northern Ireland to England and Wales in the first six months of the current year; and under which section of the Criminal Justice Act 1961 such transfers were carried out.

Mr. Mellor: Three prisoners were transferred from England and Wales to Northern Ireland during the first six months of 1986. Two of these transfers were under section 26 of the Criminal Justice Act 1961 (permanent transfer) and one under section 27 (temporary transfer). Two prisoners were transferred to England and Wales from Northern Ireland under section 27.

Wormwood Scrubs Prison

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to improve hospital conditions in Wormwood Scrubs prison.

Mr. Mellor: The Wormwood Scrubs hospital is at present located in temporary accommodation in B hall of the prison. The major cause of the present unsatisfactory conditions in the temporary hospital is a leaking steam main beneath the hall, and work is now in hand to remedy this.

Subject to financial approval, we expect to start the preliminary phase of an overall redevelopment of the prison at about the turn of the year. As part of that work, priority will be given to carrying out further remedial and upgrading work to the temporary hospital at a cost of £315,000.

Under a later phase of redevelopment it is planned to provide a permanent hospital and operating theatre within a new building linking the existing wings of the prison. It is hoped that work on this new building will start in 1988-89 and be completed in 1991-92.

Motor Cycles (Noise)

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria the Metropolitan police use in deciding what action to take regarding motor cycles which exceed the limits for noise emissions; and how many successful prosecutions there have been in each of the last five years.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner has informed me that the Metropolitan police take enforcement action as and when breaches of the restrictions on noise are detected. Information on findings of guilt for noise offences by all motor vehicles, by police force area, is published annually in "Offences Relating to Motor Vehicles, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables" (Table 18 of Issue for 1984) copies of which are in the Library. The information available on proceedings does not distinguish offences involving motor cycles.

Political Refugees

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list in the Official Report the political refugees domiciled in the United Kingdom at the latest date and the countries from which they have come;

(2) how many political refugees from Uganda are now resident in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Waddington: Information is not available in the form requested. However, the numbers granted refugee status or exceptional leave to remain in the United Kingdom in the years 1979 to 1985 are given by nationality in tables 1 and 5A to 5F of Home Office statistical bulletin "Refugee Statistics, United Kingdom 1985" (issue 12/86).

Detained Persons

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidelines have been issued to chief constables regarding the circumstances in which belts, braces, ties and shoelaces should be removed from persons detained in police custody.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The circumstances in which a detained person may be deprived of articles of clothing while in police detention are set out in section 54 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, and code C of the codes of practice which were issued to police forces in January of this year. These lay down that a detained person may retain clothing and personal effects unless the custody officer at the police station considers that he may use them to cause harm to himself or others, interfere with evidence, damage property or effect an escape. If the custody officer so considers, he has the authority to withhold such articles as he thinks necessary.

Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is satisfied with the working of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The main provisions of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 came into effect on 1 January this year. The wide-ranging new procedures introduced by the Act are being monitored closely but it is too early to make a full assessment.

Public Order

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy on public order in the light of the Gifford report into the Tottenham riots, a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Our aim remains to encourage the police to establish and maintain the good working relationship with the community, which is an essential basis for preventing crime and disorder; to ensure that the police have the manpower and the equipment necessary to tackle disorder effectively if and when it occurs; and to ensure that the law gives the police sufficient powers to prevent and deal with disorder while preserving our traditional rights of peaceful protest and assembly.

Drug Abuse

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for reports from chief constables as to the extent to which drugs are being traded on licensed premises and as to steps taken to notify licensees of the more obvious indications of drug abuse.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Chief officers are aware that drugs may be traded on licensed premises although information about the scale of such misuse is not recorded separately. I welcome the initiatives which the Brewers Society has taken to produce training materials to ensure that licensees are well equipped to respond to any drug problem that may arise on their premises.

Police National Computer

Mr. Powley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements have been made to allow the British Transport police access to the police national computer.

Mr. Hurd: The British Transport Police have always been able to obtain information from, and to provide information for, the police national computer through individual Home Department forces at the discretion of the chief constable concerned. The PNC board has recently reviewed this arrangement, and with the support of the Association of Chief Police Officers, and the Association of Chief Police Officers of Scotland has agreed that the British Transport Police should henceforth have direct access to the PNC through terminals situated in its headquarters in London. This facility, which will enable the British Transport Police to obtain information needed to carry out its duties and to enter information that may assist Home Department forces, will be subject to the same conditions as regards to the protection of PNC information as apply to all other PNC users.

Remand

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received regarding the time spent on remand in custody awaiting trial.

Mr. Mellor: Our records do not enable all representations we receive on this subject to be identified, but I recall in particular those made to us last year by the Central Council of Probation Committees, the Association of Chief Officers of Probation and the parliamentary all-party penal affairs group; also the report published by the Prison Reform Trust in March this year.

We are taking action to curb delays. In particular, we plan to move on early next year to apply statutory limits on periods in custody before trial in three of the areas where field trials of such limits have been operating.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide a breakdown of the number of home beat officers per police division within the Metropolitan police district.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 8 July 1986, c. 105]: I understand from the Commissioner that there are 1,374 home beat officers in the Metropolitan police district. The breakdown between divisions is as follows:

Racial Attacks

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide figures for the number of reported racial attacks in London, broken down by police division, for 1985 and 1986 to date.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 22 July 1986]: The available figures relate to recorded racial incidents, not all of which are criminal offences, or in the nature of attacks. The following table shows figures for the first five months of this year analysed by borough. For the corresponding figures for 1985, I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on 6 March at column 235.

Visitors (Entry Refusals)

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will investigate the reasons for the upward trend in the number of visitors to Britain refused entry in the first six months of 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington [pursuant to his reply, 22 July 1986]: Comprehensive statistics of passenger arrivals, and of those refused entry, are not yet available for the first six months of this year. But it is already apparent that during this period there has been a significant increase in refusals. In the first three months of the year, just over 5,500 passengers were removed after being refused leave to enter, an increase of about 50 per cent. over the same quarter in 1985.

The increase is continuing. For example, in May and June at Heathrow and Gatwick there were increases in initial refusals of 130 per cent. and 89 per cent. respectively for Nigerian nationals compared to the same months in 1985, and 63 per cent. and 103 per cent. for Indian nationals. As there has been no change in the criteria employed by immigration officers in applying the immigration rules it is clear that increasing numbers of passengers who are ineligible, or who are likely to be ineligible, for entry under the rules are arriving at our ports of entry.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Security Staff Grants Scheme

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the future of the security staff grants scheme.

Mr. Scott: The security staff grants scheme was introduced in 1972 as a non-statutory scheme to give the occupiers of business premises an incentive to employ static security guards to help secure their premises against terrorist attack. Over the years the scheme has been modified in the level of payments available and the categories of businesses eligible, and recent years have seen a substantial fall-off in the rate of take-up, from nearly £7 million in 1980-81 to less than £1 million in the current financial year.

Having reconsidered the value of the scheme, we have concluded that it has now served its purpose. It has therefore been decided that the scheme will be terminated with effect from 30 November 1986. Businesses eligible to claim from the scheme will have a further three months, up to 28 February 1987, to submit their outstanding claims.

Security grants to ferry companies, which for administrative convenience are paid under this scheme, will continue for the present, under other arrangements.

Nurses (Pay)

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information he has as to how many nurses in Northern Ireland earn less than £120 per week, following the 1986 pay award; what proportion of total nursing, midwifery and health visiting staff this represents; and if he will break down the figures into grades.

Mr. Needham: Nurses' basic pay rates went up on average by 7·8 per cent. on 1 July 1986. Information on the details of nurses' earnings following that increase is not yet available.

Alcohol and Drugs (Deaths)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many deaths in each of the past five years in Northern Ireland are attributable to the abuses of (a) alcohol and (b) drugs.

Mr. Needham: The information requested is as follows:

International classification of diseases Number	Cause	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985
A. Deaths from alcholol abuse

United States

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the total expenditure by his Department on promoting the interests of Northern Ireland within the United States of America; and how many persons are employed in the United States of America on a full-time and part-time basis on this work.

Dr. Boyson: Total estimated expenditure for these purposes in the current financial year is £2·25 million. Twenty-three persons are employed, all on a full-time basis; this number includes 11 industrial promotion officers, seven of whom are involved in seeking industrial investment for the whole of the United Kingdom, not Northern Ireland alone.

Crime Statistics

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the figures for the first six months of the current year for the number of persons proceeded against for scheduled offences in Northern Ireland; how many persons pleaded guilty to the principal offence; and how many persons in contested cases were found not guilty of the principal offence.

Mr. Scott: In the first six months of this year 338 persons were proceeded against in the Crown court for scheduled offences. Of these, 281 pleaded guilty to the principal offence and 57 not guilty. Of the latter 20 were acquitted.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will give separately for magistrates' courts and crown courts for the first six months of the current year the number of cases involving non-scheduled offences in which pleas of not guilty were entered; in how many of these cases verdicts of not guilty were returned; and in how many of these cases trial was by jury;

(2) how many persons were charged with non-scheduled offences; how many were charged with scheduled offences; and how many persons were found not guilty of all or some of the offences with which they were charged in the first six months of the current year;

(3) if he will publish in the Official Report the number of persons who were initially detained under other Acts and were charged under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Acts in the first six months of the current year.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Employment (Discrimination)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many cases of individual discrimination have been found by the Fair Employment Agency in the first six months of the current year; and how many of these were against (i) Catholics and (ii) Protestants.

Dr. Boyson: Two; during the period 1 January 1986 to 30 June 1986; both against Roman Catholics.

Terrorism

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many persons were detained under Northern Ireland Emergency Provisions Acts 1973 and 1978 in the first six months of the current year;

(2) how many persons detained under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Acts were charged with (a) offences under the Acts and (b) offences under other Acts (excluding common law offences) in the first six months of the current year;

(3) how many persons were detained under the Northern Ireland Emergency Provisions Act 1978 and, of those persons, how many were charged with scheduled offences and how many were charged with non-scheduled offences, in the first six months of the current year.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Security Statistics

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the security statistics for the first six months of the current year are now available, together with details of persons charged with terrorist-type offences and convictions for scheduled offences for the year.

Mr. Tom King: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Plastic Bullets

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many formal complaints have been made about incidents of police use of plastic baton rounds in the first six months of the current year; in how many cases the complaint has been upheld; and in how many cases disciplinary action has been taken against the officers involved.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many plastic bullets have been fired in Northern Ireland in the first six months of the current year; in what circumstances, and in what locations the bullets were fired; and how many persons were injured as a result of their use.

Mr. Scott: During the first six months of this year 351 plastic baton rounds were fired in Northern Ireland. Seventeen people were allegedly injured and one person was killed in that period.

I am writing to the hon. Member with the information he has requested about the circumstances and places in which the baton rounds were fired. A copy of my letter will be placed in the Library.

Prison Population

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the size of the prison population in Northern Ireland as at 30 June, divided into terrorist-type offenders and other offenders categorised by age and by sex in the following groups: under 18 years old, 18 to 25 years, 25 to 30 years, 30 to 40 years, 40 to 50 years, 50 to 60 years and over 60 years; and if he will give a breakdown of the length of sentence being served by each age group under the following headings: (i) up to three months, (ii) over three months and up to six months, (iii) over six months and under 12 months, (iv) over 12 months and under 18 months, (v) over 18 months and up to four years, (vi) over four years and up to eight years, (vii) over eight years and (viii) life; and if he will give a breakdown, divided into terrorist-type offenders and other offenders under the same sentence headings, of the numbers as a percentage of the total prison population.

Mr. Scott: On 30 June 1986 there was a total of 1,595 sentenced inmates in Northern Ireland prison establishments. This figure includes those detained in the young offenders centres. The requested breakdowns of the population are set out in the following tables:

Mr. Eggar: I refer the hon. Member to the statistics in the replies that I gave to him on 28 October 1985 and 12 November 1985 at columns 86 and 144.

As at March 1986, there were 1,111 children both educated and boarded at independent schools, whilst being financed by the diplomatic wing of the Foreign and

Commonwealth Office. The total spending from March 1985 to March 1986 was £5,641,900·98 (including tax); the unit spending per pupil differed according to the category of school with the maximum being £1,553·08 per term for boys at senior schools. At present three independent schools currently educate and board over 20 pupils. They are:

Windlesham	(39 pupils)
Bedales	(29 pupils)

Immigration

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the latest estimated waiting time to first interview for settlement applicants in each of the queues at each of the posts in the Indian sub-continent, how long applicants now being called for interview have waited; and how many people are in each queue at each post.

Mr. Eggar: Waiting times in months and the number of people in each queue as at 31 May are as follows:

* None interviewed in May.

Actual waiting time is the time waited by an applicant from lodging an application to the actual date of interview in May. Estimated waiting time is the time an applicant applying in May could expect to wait until interview.

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how long those applying for entry clearance for (a) settlement and (b) temporary purposes have been waiting before interview at British posts in (i) the Philippines, (ii) Sri Lanka, (iii) Ghana and (iv) Nigeria; and what are the expected waiting times for those now applying.

Mr. Eggar: Waiting times for entry clearance for settlement and temporary purposes are as follows:

Post	Settlement	Temporary Purposes
Manila	Six weeks	24 hours if no interview required, otherwise six weeks
Colombo	Same day	Same day
Accra	Within seven days	Same day, apart from June/September when three-seven days
Lagos	Same day	Same day
Kaduna	Same day	Same day

The waiting times for those now applying are as above.

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many entry clearances (a) in total, (b) for temporary purposes and (c) for settlement were issued during 1985 in the Indian sub-continent; and what was the cost of stationing entry clearance staff at posts in the sub-continent in that period.

Mr. Eggar: In the period 1 January-31 December 1985 a total number of 20,480 entry clearances were issued in the subcontinent. Of this figure 7,260 were for temporary purposes and 13,220 were for settlement.

Figures for the cost of stationing entry clearance staff at posts in the subcontinent for the financial year ended at 31 March 1986 are not yet available. The cost for the financial year ended 31 March 1985 was £5·2 million.

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many entry clearance officers are in post at each post in the Indian sub-continent, the Philippines and Sri Lanka at the latest convenient date and at a date 12 months before that; and if he plans to alter the complement at any of these posts.

Mr. Eggar: The information required is contained in the following table:

Numbers of ECOs by post

Post	July 1986		July 1985
	Permanent	Temporary	Permanent	Temporary
Islamabad	17	—	14	—
Karachi	1	1	2	—

Bombay	5	1	6	1
Calcutta	1	—	1	—
Dhaka	16	2	15	1
Colombo	3	2	2	3
Manila	3	1	2	1

The complement of ECOs is under constant review in the light of the pressures on the posts and other demands on available manpower.

South African Gold Coins

Mr. Cabora asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will introduce controls to prohibit the importing of gold coins from South Africa into Britain's overseas dependencies.

Mrs. Chalker: On 23 May we banned the importation of gold coins into Britain. We informed the dependent territories of our decision, and it is a matter for them to decide whether to effect a similar ban.

Uganda

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government present relations with Uganda.

Mrs. Chalker: There are many ties of friendship between Britain and Uganda. We strongly welcome President Museveni's commitment to a stable and united Uganda with full respect for human rights. The situation in the country has greatly improved, after many years of suffering. In support of President Museveni's efforts to establish stability and encourage respect for human rights we are providing substantial economic assistance and training for the Ugandan army and police force. We have pledged £5 million of emergency aid and are, in addition, currently providing £22 million from ODA and CDC funds for the rehabilitation of the Owen Falls hydro-electric station and the whole Ugandan Electricity Board systems. We are resuming programmes in the health, education and public administration sectors and are planning a natural resources sectoral review in October.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations recently Her Majesty's Government have made to Uganda concerning human rights; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: None. I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) on 18 July at column 642.

Cyprus

Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much money has been granted to Cyprus under the 1960 treaty of establishment since 1 April 1965; and if he will now review the financial obligations accepted by Her Majesty's Government under the treaty in consultation with the Government of Cyprus.

Mr. Eggar: No financial aid has been provided pursuant to the 1960 exchange of notes since 1965. We assist Cyprus in a number of other ways.

Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the obstacles which now prevent final agreement between Turkish and Greek Cypriots; and if, as a guarantor power, Her Majesty's Government will now exert pressure to secure agreement.

Mr. Eggar: The UN Secretary General presented his third set of proposals in March this year. We believe that they provide a good basis for a peaceful, just and lasting settlement. The Turkish Cypriot side has accepted them. We hope that the Greek Cypriot side will still do so. We continue actively to support the UN initiative and to urge both sides to co-operate fully with the Secretary General's efforts.

Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he plans to seek changes to the 1960 treaty of establishment so as to acquire ownership of the soverign bases in Cyprus in perpetuity.

Mr. Eggar: No. The base areas in Cyprus are already sovereign British territory.

Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what factors led Her Majesty's Government to open an office in Turkish-occupied northern Cyprus; what the establishment will be; and if this implies recognition of the self-styled Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus.

Mr. Eggar: We have not opened any new office in northern Cyprus. In 1960, on the independence of the Republic, we acquired a property which is now in the Turkish sector of Nicosia, to serve as the high commissioner's official residence. Since 1971, when it was last used as the residence, we have maintained a residual presence there in order to deal with inquiries from individual Turkish Cypriots and British nationals in the north. This long-standing arrangement carries no implication of recognition of the so-called "Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus".

Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government will urgently seek Turkey's compliance in the full implementation of resolution 3212 passed by the United Nations Assembly and resolution 365 passed by the Security Council.

Mr. Eggar: We have made clear to the Turkish Government, as to all the parties involved, our support for the United Nations Secretary General's initiative which takes account of these resolutions.

Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Turkey sought the agreement of the other two guarantor powers prior to the construction of the military airstrip at Lefkonico, northern Cyprus.

Mr. Eggar: We understand that Lefkonico is a Turkish Cypriot civilian airport which does not fall to be considered under the treaty of guarantee.

Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will call upon the Turkish Government to withdraw their occupational forces from Cyprus as a prelude to the two sides reaching agreement based on the De Cuellar initiatives.

Mr. Eggar: The United Nations Secretary General's proposals on Cyprus provide for negotiations on the withdrawal of foreign troops from the Republic as part of an overall settlement. We strongly support the Secretary General's initiative as the most effective instrument by which a settlement of the Cyprus question may be achieved.

Foreign Affairs Council

Dr. Hampson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the meeting of the Foreign Affairs Council on 21 and 22 July.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. and learned Friend chaired a meeting of the Foreign Ministers of the Twelve meeting in political co-operation on the morning of 21 July. This was followed by a meeting of the Foreign Affairs Council on 21 and 22 July, also chaired by my right hon. and learned Friend, at which I and my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade represented the United Kingdom.

The Foreign Ministers of the Twelve had an exchange of views on South Africa on the basis of a report by my right hon. and learned Friend on his recent visit to the region and his talks in Washington on 18 July. The full support of the Twelve for the efforts of my right hon. and learned Friend during his current visit to South Africa was reiterated. There was also a discussion of East/West relations. My right hon. and learned Friend reported on the recent visit to London by Mr. Shevardnadze.

The Foreign Ministers reviewed the policy of the Twelve towards Ethiopia and the Horn of Africa and issued a statement. The Foreign Ministers meeting in the framework both of political co-operation and the Council reviewed the principles of the human rights policy of the European Community and its member states and issued a statement. Both statements have been placed in the Library of the House.

The Foreign Affairs Council heard a report from the Commission of the Community's trade relations with Japan. The Council reaffirmed its declaration of 10 March. It invited the Commission to press for early action by the Japanese Government to remove discriminatory barriers against imports of alcoholic drinks. It agreed that if there was no early progress, the Commission should instigate action under article XXIII of the GATT. The Council invited the Commission to select other market sectors for similar treatment, to review Japanese export practices with a view to obtaining redress where they violate GATT obligations and to report to the Council in the autumn.

The Council also discussed the Community's trade relations with the United States. It welcomed the interim solution reached on the trade dispute over the trade effects of enlargement of the Community and called on the United States to confirm the agreement reached in negotiations on semi-finished steel products. The Council reaffirmed the Community's willingness to work for an early conclusion to the citrus/pasta dispute on the basis of a balanced package which included adequate assurances from the United States that the Community's Mediterranean agreements would not be subject to further challenge. The Council repeated its intention to take equivalent action in the event of any further unilateral United States action to impede imports from the Community.

The Council agreed preferential access levels for New Zealand butter exports to the United Kingdom market of 76,500 and 74,500 tonnes for 1987 and 1988 respectively. This is a very satisfactory outcome. The Commission will make proposals before 1 August 1988 on the maintenance of the arrangements for New Zealand access after 1 January 1989.

The Council considered a revised mandate for negotiations with the Community's mediterranean preferential partners to take account of enlargement, and discussed economic and trade relations with the member countries of the Gulf Co-operation Council.

The Council agreed to explore urgently means of using the funds in the 1986 budget allocated to fight hunger in the world in accordance with existing programmes.

The Council discussed the appointment of members of the Economic and Social Committee of the European Community.

The Council adopted a Commission proposal on the total allowable catches for member states fishing in international waters covered by the North-West Atlantic Fisheries Organisation.

A useful meeting of the EC/Yugoslavia Co-operation Council which reviewed the operation of the EC/Yugoslavia agreement was held in the margins of the Foreign Affairs Council. There was also informal discussion of current political issues over a dinner attended by EC Foreign Ministers and the Yugoslav Ministers present.

ENVIRONMENT

Radioactivity

17. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement on his latest assessment of the impact of radionuclides on the environment arising from the Chernobyl incident.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department published a leaflet in May 1986 on the assessment of the levels of radioactivity in the United Kingdom from the accident at Chernobyl. A copy has been placed in the Library of the House. Its conclusions remain valid. NRPB is undertaking a more detailed analysis which will be published in due course.

Surplus Land

19. Mr. McLoughlin asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is satisfied with the powers available to him for directing public bodies to sell their surplus land.

Mr. Ridley: I am using the relevant powers to encourage, and where necessary to direct, public owners of unused and underused land to dispose of it. However, in view of the amount of such land and the time it is taking to bring it back into use, I am considering what further powers may be necessary to ensure that surplus land is put to good use.

38. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is satisfied with the performance of statutory undertakings in disposing of their unused and underused land.

Sir George Young: No. Statutory undertakers and nationalised industries have a financial incentive to dispose of underused or surplus land in their ownership. There is, however, always scope to improve the rate of disposal, and where necessary my right hon. Friend will consider using the powers available to him under part X of the Local Government Planning and Land Act 1980 to direct disposal of unused and underused publicly owned land.

59. Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will indicate the number of times he has used his powers under section 98 of the Local Government Act 1980 to direct (a) local authorities and (b) statutory undertakers to sell surplus land.

Sir George Young: On 16 July my right hon. Friend, under the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980, directed the owners of four sites, entered on the registers of unused and underused land, to dispose of their interest in the land. This brings the total of such directions issued to 29.

The owners of these sites have all been local authorities. Together with ministerial colleagues my right hon. Friend is keeping under review the performance of other public bodies in bringing unused and underused land back into use or disposing of it.

Litter Acts

20. Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received about the implementation of the Litter Acts; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: The last representation we received was in January 1985 about implementation of section 4 of the Litter Act 1983.

Local Government Finance

21. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met representatives of local authority associations to discuss local authority spending.

Mr. Waldegrave: On 7 July 1986 in the consultative council on local government finance.

25. Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many submissions he has received to date in response to the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government."

26. Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities have responded to date to the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government."

Mr. Ridley: I have received over 400 responses to our tax and grant proposals, about 70 of them from local authorities. The consultation period continues until 31 October.

60. Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is yet able to announce any decision with regard to the recommendations of the Widdicombe report concerning section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on the 22 July to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels).

61. Mrs. Shields asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received from local authorities concerning the use of capital receipts for the benefit of people requiring council housing.

Mr. John Patten: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations from local authorities, and from the local authority associations, seeking changes in the regulations on the use of capital receipts. Additional capital expenditure funded from receipts produces a net increase in the public sector borrowing requirement, and for that reason it has to be controlled and phased. However, even the present prescribed proportion of 20 per cent. for most housing receipts means that, over the three years after a receipt has been generated, an authority can spend roughly half of it on new capital projects.

Council House Sales

22. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is satisfied with the rate of sale of non-sheltered council dwellings for the elderly under the right-to-buy provision.

Sir George Young: Non-sheltered housing for the elderly is included in the right to buy unless landlords apply to the Secretary of State for exemption. Where such an application is made, my right hon. Friend must consider it against the criteria laid down in the Act. Considerations relating to the overall rate of sales do not enter into his decisions on individual cases.

31. Mr. Watts asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from local authority tenants seeking guidance as to the exercise of their right to buy.

Mr. John Patten: Representations are received from tenants whose purchase is delayed or who disagree with their landlord over the terms of sale. The Department offers advice and may take cases up with the authority concerned. There have also been many inquiries about the provisions of the Housing and Planning Bill.

Houses in Multiple Occupation

23. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimates he has made, following his Department's recently published national survey, of the length of time it will take for the housing and safety conditions in houses in multiple occupation to be brought up to the minimum standards laid down by local housing authorities.

Sir George Young: Parliament has placed on local authorities the responsibility for securing adequate conditions in HMOs through the use of powers which have been available for many years. It is for each authority to decide what standards are appropriate. I refer the hon. Member to the answer which I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend, the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox).

Mr. Peter Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to publish the final report of the physical and social survey of a sample of houses in multiple occupation.

Sir George Young: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer which I gave to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) on 17 July 1986 at column 626.

Residential Land

24. Mr. Cockeram asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is now able to supply figures as to the proportion of new housing starts, in the most recent two years, which are situated on land which has previously been developed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Information in the form requested is not available. However, figures recently issued for land use changes in England recorded during 1985 show that about 45 per cent. of land developed for residential use was previously developed or was vacant land in built up areas. The other 55 per cent. was mainly land previously in agricultural use.

33. Sir Peter Mills asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of land used for residential development in recent years has been previously developed.

Mr. Tracey: Figures recently issued for land use changes in England, recorded during 1985, show that about 45 per cent. of land developed for residential use was previously developed or was vacant land in built-up areas. The other 55 per cent. was mainly land previously in agricultural use.

Inner Area Programme

27. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment in what way he monitors the allocation and administration of funds under the inner area programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Urban programme resources are allocated to individual local authorities according to assessments of their needs and their performance in formulating and implementing inner area programmes which accord with ministerial guidelines. Clear objectives are set for individual projects within an overall strategy. Local authorities monitor projects systematically and produce annual reports on their programmes. There are arrangements for systematic sample checking of projects by departmental officials.

Widdicombe Report

28. Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will extend the consultation period in respect of the Widdicombe report recommendations.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have no present plans to do so.

Homelessness

30. Mr. Raynsford asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the number of homeless households likely to be accepted by local authorities in England in 1986, and the number living in bed and breakfast accommodation at the end of December 1986.

Sir George Young: Since such estimates would depend on individual local authorities' policies, the housing stock position in their areas, and other factors, too many assumptions would be involved for them to be reliable.

Gipsy Sites

32. Mr. Moate asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received advocating the review of cost criteria for gipsy sites, particularly as they apply to smaller sites.

Mr. Tracey: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations closely related to this subject from hon. Members, individual local authorities and their associations, and from the Romany Guild. We are considering these representations in the context of the review of gipsy sites policy which we are at present conducting at the request of the Select Committee on the Environment.

Water Authorities (Privatisation)

34. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he intends to introduce, in the next Session of Parliament, legislation to prepare the water authorities for privatisation in advance of the main legislation on this subject; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I cannot anticipate the Queen's Speech.

House Building

35. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the present number of council properties being built in the London borough of Wandsworth.

Mr. John Patten: Wandsworth is not building more council houses. It is rightly making room for waiting list applicants in its existing stock in which it has been investing more than almost any other London borough by encouraging low-cost home ownership opportunities for existing tenants, largely through private developers and housing associations.

29. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many houses were constructed by the public sector or begun in (a) 1979 and (b) 1985 in Leicester.

Mr. John Patten: I refer the hon. and learned Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State to the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) on 14 July at column 321.

41. Mr. Ottaway asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he next expects to meet the Housebuilders Federation to discuss the release of land for house building.

Mr. Ridley: I expect to meet the Housebuilders Federation later in the year. I cannot predict what subjects will be discussed.

District Auditor

36. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to introduce legislation to change the role of the district auditor.

Mrs. Rumbold: I have no present plans to do so. In its report, the Widdicombe committee of inquiry into the conduct of local authority business has made a number of recommendations concerning the role of the district auditor, and I shall be considering its proposals in the light of the consultation exercise announced in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) on 19 June at column 639.

West Sussex Structure Plan

37. Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will be announcing the result of his review of the West Sussex county council structure plan.

Mr. Tracey: Work is proceeding as quickly as possible, and my right hon. Friend hopes to make an announcement later this year.

Clean-up Scheme

39. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the progress of his anti-litter campaign.

40. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is yet in a position to announce details of the national clean-up scheme.

Mrs. Rumbold: I have nothing to add to the statement about UK2000 made by my hon. Friend the Minister for Environment, Countryside and Local Government on 14 July 1986 at column 683.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many sites of special scientific interest or sites identified by the Nature Conservancy Council for notification as such have been damaged since 1 January 1984 due to the actions of statutory undertakers upon land where they were not at the time the legal owners or occupiers;

(2) how many sites of special scientific interest or sites idenified by the Nature Conservancy Council for notification as such have been damaged since 1 January 1984 due to the actions of any third parties where such parties were not at the time the legal owners or occupiers.

Mrs. Rumbold: The information requested is currently being compiled. I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as it is available.

Wingshaver Case

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if the wildlife division in Bristol has now replied in full to the RSPCA's letter of 5 March regarding his Department's involvement in the Wingshaver case.

Mrs. Rumbold: The matter is still under investigation. An interim reply was sent on 1 July.

Private Prosecutions

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department has made any contribution to the costs of any private prosecutions carried out on behalf of his Department.

Mr. Ridley: It is possible under the staff rules of my Department for financial assistance to be given in certain cases where a staff member has been injured by the wrongful act of a third party. But such assistance will be given only if it is considered that the prosecution is in the interest of both the staff member and the Department. There have been no such cases in recent years. I am not aware of other circumstance where the Department has contributed to private prosecutions.

Council Services (Competitive Tendering)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his latest estimate of the impact on ratepayers if all council services were subject to competitive tender.

Mrs. Rumbold: It is not possible to estimate what savings would result from exposing all local authority services to competition.

However, authorities spend well over £2,000 million annually on the six services for which the Government have proposed legislation, so even modest percentage savings would be substantial in absolute terms.

Housing Investment Programme

Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to increase the housing investment programme allocations to local authorities in view of the increased expenditure arising out of the Housing Defects Act and the proposed increase in eligible expense limits.

Mr. John Patten: The housing investment programme allocations for 1986-87 have already taken account of local authorities' likely expenditure under the housing defects legislation. My Department will continue to monitor the position carefully and all the relevant factors, including the impact of the increased eligible expense limits, will be taken into account in decisions about the distribution of housing resources for 1987-88.

Merseyside Development Corporation (Private Hospital)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if there have been any representations to the Merseyside development corporation for the building of a private hospital; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I shall answer this question shortly.

Cottages, Hallsands

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he hopes to answer the letter from the hon. Member for South Hams, dated 21 April, about the cottages at Hallsands which are falling off the cliff; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: I wrote to my hon. Friend on 18 July 1986.

Nuclear Power Stations (Accidents)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the number of accidents at Britain's nuclear power stations reported to him by the nuclear installations inspectorate since the accident at Chernobyl on 26 April of the current year.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Nuclear Installations Inspectorate of the Health and Safety Executive does not report accidents at nuclear power plants to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. Under the arrangements announced to Parliament on 26 July 1982 by my right hon. Friend the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy, incidents at nuclear sites in Britain which are reported to the Secretaries of State for Energy and for Scotland by the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate are published quarterly by the Health and Safety Executive. The next report to cover the period 1 April to 31 July 1986 will be published later this year and, like its predecessors, will be placed in the Library of the House.

Wash Site of Special Scientific Interest

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when his Department received details of the Wash site of special scientific interest, Norfolk/Lincolnshire, from the Nature Conservancy Council together with its recommendations to list this site under the Ramsar convention and the European Community directive on the conservation of wild birds; and when listing can be expected.

Mr. Ridley: Proposals for listing The Wash (north Norfolk and Lincolnshire coast) as a special protection area under EC directive 79/409 and as a wetland of international importance under the Ramsar convention were submitted to this Department by the Nature Conservancy Council in March 1984. The listing of this site raises complex issues which we have not been able to resolve as quickly as I would have wished. Discussions on the matter are continuing and we shall endeavour to bring these to a conclusion as soon as possible.

Radioactive Waste

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the Government expect to publish their response to the Environment Committee's report on radioactive waste.

Mr. Ridley: The Government's response is being published today and copies have been placed in the Library.

Chernobyl (Monitoring)

Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will publish the monitoring information provided to the National Radiological Protection Board following the Chernobyl accident.

Mr. Waldegrave: Her Majesty's Stationery Office has today published a compilation of the results of monitoring for radioactivity in the United Kingdom following the Chernobyl accident. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House of Commons.

Domestic Rating Revaluation

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of the likely effect of a domestic rating revaluation based on capital values.

Mr. Waldegrave: There are no comprehensive data about the outcome of a capital revaluation of domestic rateable values. However, information about the relationship between house prices and existing rateable values suggests that:

i. because house prices vary widely between regions, capital value rates would be even less well related to income than they are now;

ii. the effects of such a valuation would be different for different types of housing. On average, terraced houses would face increases in their rate bills everywhere except the Midlands and the north west; there would be average rises of over 20 per cent. for detached houses in the south of England;

iii. some individual occupiers would face much larger rises, more than 1 million would have increases of 80 per cent. or more in their rate bills.

Because capital revaluation would not improve local accountability, and because rate bills would remain unrelated to the use made of local services by households of different sizes, the Government have no intention of conducting a revaluation on this basis.

I have placed in the Library more detailed estimates of the likely effects of a capital revaluation.

Policy Achievements

Mr. Stevens asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the main policy achievements of his Department in the year 1985-86.

Mr. Ridley: I have today placed in the Library copies of a report which gives an account of the various measures taken by my Department between April 1985 and March 1986. This report supplements the earlier documents covering the period since May 1979 which were provided pursuant to the replies to my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) on 3 May 1983 and 9 May 1984, and to my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) on 3 April 1985.

Enterprise Zones Planning Schemes

Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he proposes any change to the provisions governing the termination of enterprise zones planning schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: Schedule 32 of the Local Government Planning and Land Act 1980 effectively terminates any planning permission granted by the enterprise zone scheme as soon as the scheme is terminated, generally 10 years after designation. Even if development authorised by the scheme is well under way, completion would then require a further planning permission under ordinary planning powers. My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and Wales and I are concerned that such an abrupt cut-off could deter developers from investing in zones. We therefore propose that development authorised by the enterprise zone scheme, which had begun before the zone's termination, should continue to have the benefit of that planning permission though not of the other benefits available in enterprise zones. As a safeguard against unreasonable delay in completing developments after an enterprise zone's termination date, we propose to make available to local planning authorities, after the EZ termination date, the completion notice mechanism, which already applies to normal planning permission under S44 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1971 and section 41 of the Town and Country Planning (Scotland) Act 1972.

The Government also propose that the same arrangements for serving completion notices would apply in simplified planning zones.

Amendments will be put down shortly to the Housing and Planning Bill to give effect to these proposals.

Dog Licensing

Mr. Lilley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is yet in a position to announce the Government's conclusions on the future arrangements for dog licensing in Great Britain.

Mr. Ridley: The dog licence fee costs about £3·5 million annually to collect, and raises less than £1 million. There is some support for the licence from those who are concerned that dog nuisance and dog control should be properly managed and funded. Local authorities are best placed to deal with this problem and we think it right that they should continue to do so. They have adequate existing powers and can make byelaws as necessary. National legislation providing safeguards for farmers whose livestock are worried by dogs will remain in place. In the light of our proposals for the 1987-88 rate support grant settlement, local authorities will be able to accommodate any expenditure which they may judge to be necessary.

Accordingly, the Government have decided to introduce legislation to abolish the licence when a suitable opportunity arises.

Housing Policy

42. Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to issue a White Paper on future housing policy.

Mr. John Patten: My right hon. Friend has no plans to do so at present.

Water Authorities (Privatisation)

43. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will now publish all the submissions received by his Department in response to the White Paper on "Privatisation of the English and Welsh Water Authorities".

Mr. John Patten: My Department has received 374 letters from organisations and others, following publication of the White Paper in February. It is for the originators of those letters to publish their views, if they so wish.

Defective Houses

44. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to seek to alter the Housing Act 1985 to give further assistance to houses designated under the Housing Defects Act 1984.

Mr. John Patten: We have no plans to do so.

Severn Barrage

45. Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to meet the Severn Tidal Power Group in the near future to discuss environmental matters relating to a possible Severn barrage.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend has no plans to meet the Severn Tidal Power Group. Officials are in close contact with the Department of Energy and the Severn Tidal Power Group. I can assure my hon. Friend that environmental matters will continue to be fully taken into account.

Local Government Finance

46. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to receive figures for 1985-86 on the capital receipts held by local authorities.

Mrs. Rumbold: My Department will shortly be collecting figures from English local authorities on the level of their accumulated capital receipts at the end of 1985-86.

Out-of-town Shopping Areas

47. Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the implications for inner areas and town centres of the growth of out-of-town shopping centres; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: Development proposals of this kind have to be assessed individually and in relation to local circumstances. Our general policy is that it may be necessary in exceptional circumstances to take account of the cumulative effects of recent and proposed large scale retail development in the locality, and to consider whether they are on such a scale and of a kind that they could seriously affect the vitality and viability of a nearby town centre as a whole.

Departmental Buildings

48. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many premises maintained by his Department are licensed for the solemnisation of matrimony.

Sir George Young: According to my inquiries, there are 174 such premises.

Local Authorities (Rent Arrears)

49. Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is satisfied with the progress being made by local authorities in reducing the level of their rent arrears.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend is not satisfied. A minority of authorities have levels of arrears persistently far above those achieved by apparently comparable authorities. These arrears could be substantially reduced if such authorities adopted more effective policies and practice as recommended in the recent Audit Commission report on housing management.

Local Authorities (Designation)

50. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes announcing details of any authorities to be designated in 1987-88 under the Rates Act 1984.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer the hon. Member to the statement made yesterday by my right hon. Friend.

Inner City Areas

51. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what further initiatives he intends to take to encourage more private investment into the inner city areas.

Sir George Young: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Knowles) by my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction on 25 June at columns 317-18.

Domestic Rates

52. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the average percentage increase in domestic rates between 1979-80 and 1986-87.

Mr. Waldegrave: The average increase in domestic rates in England was 150 per cent. between 1979-80 and 1986-87.

World Cup (Mexico)

53. Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the behaviour of British football supporters at the Mexico World Cup and the steps taken to reduce the risk of crowd trouble, including the actions of Her Majesty's ambassador in Mexico and his staff.

Mr. Tracey: I refer the hon. Member to the answers given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Mr. Sayeed) on 17 July, at columns 579-80.

I would add that, having attended the World Cup tournament from 8 to 15 June, I can report at first hand that the behaviour of the British fans won praise from the Mexican people and media. The Government's planning and preparations, with the national football associations and the Mexican authorities, proved highly effective. During the competition the ambassador and his staff gave expert assistance to British supporters, and helped to foster extremely good relations with the local people, and I am sure the hon. Member, who was also able to observe the arrangements at first hand, would wish to associate himself with my gratitude and praise for their efforts.

Fair Rents

54. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to empower rent officers to fix fair rents in all instances where housing benefit is paid.

Sir George Young: Rent officers already have powers to register fair rents in respect of regulated tenancies, on application from the landlord, tenant or local authority. However, my right hon. Friend has no proposals to introduce compulsory rent registration for such tenancies where the tenant is in receipt of housing benefit.

Royal Wedding

55. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the costs to his Department of the arrangements for the royal wedding on 23 July.

Mr. Tracey: My Department estimates a net cost of approximately £40,000 on providing services for today's royal wedding, but final costs will not be available until all bills have been paid.

Islington

56. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the proportion of the income of the London borough of Islington which came from central Government funds in 1979-80 and as to the equivalent figure for 1986-87.

Mrs. Rumbold: Figures for 1979-80 are not comparable with those for 1986-87 since both grant and expenditure were based on different definitions.

In 1981-82, the first year of the present block grant system, central Government block grant formed 34·1 per cent. of Islington's total expenditure. The latest estimate for 1986-87 is that block grant will form 44·8 per cent. of the council's total expenditure.

Refuse Collection and Waste Disposal

57. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much was allocated in the grant-related expenditure allocation for (a) Waltham Forest and (b) nationally, in respect of refuse collection and waste disposal (i) in 1979 and (ii) in the current year.

Mr. Waldegrave: Following is the information for 1986-87:

£ million

	Refuse collection	Waste disposal
Waltham Forest	2,114	1,975
England Total	408,500	224,400

There were no grant-related expenditure assessments in 1979; these were first brought in under the present block grant system in 1981-82.

New Towns (North-East)

58. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the present position concerning the consultations relating to the future of the north-east new towns.

Mr. Tracey: My right hon. Friend is considering both the report prepared by the chairmen of the two north-east development corporations on successor arrangements and the comments he has received on that report. An announcement on the course to be followed will be made as soon as possible.

Nuclear Waste

62. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received about his policy on the disposal of nuclear waste.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend has received a considerable number of representations from hon. Members and others. These mostly concern the alternative potential sites for the disposal of low-level radioactive waste, and the special development order permitting NIREX to proceed with site investigations.

Tobacco Industry (Sports Sponsorship)

63. Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to announce the agreement between his Department and members of the tobacco industry on the sponsorship of sporting events.

Mr. Tracey: I am currently in negotiation with the tobacco industry. I shall announce the results of those negotiations when they have been completed. By agreement with the industry, the talks are confidential.

Local Authority Officers

64. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to provide for controls on the appointment by local authorities of officers with partisan commitment; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Widdicombe committee of inquiry has proposed a wide-ranging package of measures to deal with the impact of politicisation on the conduct of local authority business, including some concerned with the employment of officers. I shall consider its proposals in the light of the consultation I announced in a reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) on 19 June at column 639.

Government Land Sales

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) under what authority he is selling Government-owned land at preferential rates to public authorities for community use;

(2) what sales he has made of Government land to public authorities on preferential terms; and for what reasons;

(3) if he will make it his policy to sell publicly owned land on preferential terms where it is to be dedicated for community use.

Mr. Tracey: Government Departments dispose of surplus land at current market value unless there are exceptional circumstances justifying a concessionary price. Whether or not a sale for community use would be on preferential terms would depend on the circumstances of the particular case. I am not aware of any recent sales by my right hon. Friend at concessionary rates.

Planning Permission (Appeals)

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many refusals of planning permission have been reversed on appeal to him in each London borough during the last period of 12 months for which figures are available.

Mr. Tracey: The number of planning appeals allowed for the London boroughs during the period April 1985 to March 1986 is as follows:

Boroughs	Appeals allowed
City of London	0
Barking and Dagenham	4
Barnet	32

Radiation

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all airborne releases from nuclear facilities in the United Kingdom for the period 25 April to 20 May.

Mrs. Rumbold [pursuant to her reply, 3 June 1986, c. 492]: Figures for airborne releases from Central Electricity Generating Board nuclear power stations in megabecquerels during the period 25 April to 25 May 1986 are as follows:

Station	Aerosols (1)	(2)	Sulphur 35	Iodine 13	Argon 41
Berkeley	4	5	—	—	—
Bradwell	9	37	—	—	—
Hinkley Point A	16	30	4,806	—	3.0E8
Hinkley Point B	42		2,849	38	1.5E7
Trawsfyndd	28	41	—	—	—
Dungeness A	27	40	—	—	—
Dungeness B	<40		<5,400	22	2.8E6
Sizewell	73	447	1,100	—	1.1E8

Wylfa	8		—	—	—
Hartlepool	<3		<588	71	1.5E6
Heysham	<4		1,307	228	1.8E5

Some of these figures are enhanced due to the detection of fallout from the Chernobyl accident. This reached a maximum on 2 and 3 May and affects the figures for aerosols for those stations with shield cooling air systems. Column 1 under aerosols excludes the measurements for 3 May and column 2 gives the measurements for 3 May.

It will take a further two to three weeks to obtain the figures for the facilities run by British Nuclear Fuels plc and the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority. I shall then write to the hon. Member.

Carsington Reservoir

Mr. McLoughlin asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he can now indicate the date on which he expects the final report from Mr. Roy Coxon on the future of the Carsington reservoir.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 25 June 1986, c. 233-34]: The final report by Mr. R. E. Coxon BSc, DIC, FEng, FICE, FASCE on the failure in 1984 of the Carsington embankment dam is being published today by Her Majesty's Stationery Office and I have placed copies in the Library.

Mr. Coxon's findings include the following:

> The investigation of the failure has been carefully and diligently pursued. The work provides a sound base for use in assessment of the cause and is adequate to establish the data on which remedial works could be confidently based.
> A satisfactory structure could be built at this site and integrated with the elements of the pevious structure identified to be left in place.

In respect of reservoir safety generally, Mr. Coxon's recommendations include the following:

> The preparation of design reports should be a fundamental part of the design process. Consideration should be given to their being required as part of the attachments to certification under the Reservoirs Act 1975.
> Consideration should also be given to centralisation of key records relating to certification and inspection of dams. This could afford rapid identification and onward reference in case of need by others.
> There is merit in involvement of a Board or Panel of Specialists in projects of this kind to review key elements relevant to design and construction, although such a board could in no way relieve other parties of their normal responsibilities.

Mr. Coxon's report is comprehensive and contains detailed summaries of technical investigations carried out by the separate parties involved. His has been a complex and time-consuming task, and he is to be congratulated upon the efficient way in which he has carried it out.

I accept Mr. Coxon's conclusions that there is an adequate technical explanation of the reasons for the failure, and that a replacement embankment could be designed and safely constructed on the Carsington site using locally available materials. It is now for the Severn-Trent water authority to decide, in the light of Mr. Coxon's report, what action should be taken.

I shall study carefully Mr. Coxon's recommendations on reservoir safety generally.

TRANSPORT

Tourist Buses (Westminster)

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has on the number of tourist buses parked in bus lanes on Westminster bridge and main roads within a mile of the House of Commons on 14, 15 and 16 July.

Mr. David Mitchell: None. The Department hopes to have later this year the results of a series of sample surveys of tourist coach movements and parking now being undertaken.

Aircraft Noise

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) whether he will seek the tightening of the International Civil Aviation Organisation chapter 3 regulations to prevent any new aircraft noisier than the quietest currently in production from entering service; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what recent representations he has received from hon. Members, public organisations and the general public on aircraft noise;

(3) what is the average number of years that aircraft not meeting the requirements of the International Civil Aviation Organisation chapter 3 are allowed to remain on the British register;

(4) whether he has any intention to set a time limit for large civil aircraft which do not meet International Civil Aviation Organisation chapter 3 to be allowed to remain on the British register;

(5) what is his policy concerning the continued production and entry onto the British register of large civil passenger aircraft that do not meet the requirements of International Civil Aviation Organisation chapter 3; and if he will make a statement;

(6) if he will list those large civil passenger aircraft currently in production that conform to the noise regulations of International Civil Aviation Organisation chapter 3;

(7) if all large passenger aircraft currently in production and being introduced onto the British register meet the requirements in regard to noise as laid down by the International Civil Aviation Organisation chapter 3 regulations;

Mr. Moore: Noise certificated subsonic jet aeroplanes have to meet the standards laid down in the International Civil Aviation Organisation's annex 16, volume 1, "Aircraft Noise", and fall into two categories: chapter 2, and the more stringent chapter 3. In the White Paper on Airports Policy (para. 8.5) the Government pointed to the difficulties of replacing chapter 2 aeroplanes with chapter 3 types, but said that it would continue to play a leading role internationally in developing controls to limit the use of these aeroplanes. Whether this would entail preventing chapter 2 aeroplanes from being added to the United Kingdom register at some point in time is a matter for further consideration, as is the question of how long they should be permitted to remain on the register.

ICAO, with United Kingdom support, has decided to leave the phasing out of the production of chapter 2 aeroplanes to market forces, and I am not aware of any orders by United Kingdom airlines for new large passenger jet aeroplanes which do not meet chapter 3 standards. Recently ICAO's Committee on Aviation Environmental Protection decided that the need for increasing the stringency of the noise standards should be examined by a working group, on which the United Kingdom will be represented. The large passenger aeroplanes in production that meet chapter 3 are as follows:

Airbus
A300
A310
A320

Boeing
737-300
747 (most models)
757
767

British Aerospace
BAe 146

Fokker
F100

McDonnell Douglas
DC10
MD80 series

During the first six months of the year my right hon. Friend and I received 50 letters from hon. Members and 1,267 letters from members of the public about aircraft noise. In addition we have had seven meetings with interested organisations and hon. Members.

Motor Cycles (Noise)

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what are the limits of noise levels allowed for motor cycles; and what steps he is taking to secure compliance with the current levels;

(2) if he will introduce legislation to stop the activities of motor cycle repair shops that fit silencer modifications or conversions that do not meet the legal requirements for noise suppression;

(3) what is the level for noise emissions by motor cycles; and when and how this was determined;

(4) what discussions he has had with his colleagues in the Council of Transport Ministers of European Economic Community in regard to reducing motor cycle noise, aircraft noise and lorry noise; and if he will make a statement;

(5) what discussions he has had with police authorities in regard to seeking to reduce the problem of motor cycle noise; and if he will make a statement;

(6) what steps he is taking to reduce the levels of noise emissions from motor cycles;

(7) when he last met representatives of motor cycle manufacturers to discuss the reduction of noise emissions from motorcycles.

Mr. David Mitchell: The current maximum noise limits for new motor cycles were laid down by European Community Directive 78/1015/EEC and are as follows:

	dB(A)
Up to 80 cc	78
80 to 125 cc	80
125 to 350 cc	83
350 to 500 cc	85
Over 500 cc	86

Discussions are currently taking place in the Community on Commission proposals for reducing these limits; details are given in explanatory memorandum 9148/84. Tighter limits for new lorries were agreed in 1984 and will take effect in 1989 and 1990. There are already two directives on the limitation of aircraft noise and any further Commission initiatives will be examined carefully.

Regulations were made in 1984 to require any silencer or exhaust fitted to a motor cycle first used on or after 1 January 1985 to be marked to show its compliance with British Standard BS AU 193: 1983. This should encourage manufacturers, repairers and dealers to supply and fit only components which fully meet the noise requirements.

We receive many complaints from the general public and from hon. Members about motor cycle noise. There are also letters from motor cyclists who are needlessly worried by reports in the motor cycle press that the new noise limits being discussed in Europe would make it impossible to manufacture air-cooled machines.

We have regular contact with the organisations concerned including the National Motorcycle Council, which represents motor cycle manufacturers and other groups concerned with motor cycling. My hon. Friend the Minister responsible for roads and traffic met the council's secretary on 10 July.

Officials of the Department have held discussions with the Association of Chief Police Officers about the difficulties in enforcing noise requirements on motorcycles in use, particularly where riders deliberately tamper with their machines. There is no easy solution to this problem.

Drivers' Hours

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for Transport what action he has asked the European Community Commission to take regarding re-examining the application of the drivers' hours and tachograph regulations to private driving.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: European Community regulations 3820/85 and 3821/85 directly apply in the United Kingdom, with effect from 29 September, to passenger carrying vehicles of more than 17 seats even if the vehicles are being run privately or by voluntary organisations. I have asked the Commission to initiate a review of this subject and I have suggested that, in view of costs involved, and taking account of the needs of road safety, an exemption of privately driven vehicles which do not travel more than 100 kilometres from their base might be appropriate.

British Rail

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Transport when British Rail will publish its annual accounts for 1985-86; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The British Railways Board's report and accounts for the 12 months to 31 March 1986 were published and laid before Parliament yesterday. They show that BR has substantially recovered from the losses it incurred in 1984-85 due to the miners' strike and that it is on target to meet the Government's requirements for a reduction in the public service obligation grant. I congratulate the chairman, board and staff on the progress which they are making in meeting their objectives and improving services to the customer.

SCOTLAND

Inverclyde Initiative

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he is satisfied with the working of the Inverclyde initiative; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many jobs have been created by the Inverclyde initiative at the latest date; and, of these, how many are full-time occupations.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The Inverclyde initiative is a long-term programme whose aim is to stimulate the regeneration of the local economy. The employment target is the creation of up to 2,000 jobs during the five-year period of the initiative. Most of the work so far has concentrated on creating an environment which will be attractive to investors and entrepreneurs. A £6 million programme of land improvement measures is in progress, and £3·5 million was spent in the first year of the initiative to March 1986. Proposals for the redevelopment of a site at Customs house quay were recently given outline planning permission by the Inverclyde district council, and these could lead to the creation of 700 jobs.

Nurses (Pay)

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has as to how many nurses in Scotland earn less than £120 per week following the 1986 pay award; what proportion of total nursing, midwifery and health visiting staff this represents; and if he will break the figures down into grades.

Mr. John MacKay: I regret that this information is not held centrally in Scotland.

School Meals

Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing (a) the total number of staff employed in the school meals service in January 1986 in each region, division or island authority in Scotland, and (b) the numbers of staff employed for (i) 30 or more hours per week, and (ii) less than 30 hours per week.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information is as follows:

Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will produce a comparative table showing the total uptake of school meals to pupils present in percentage terms from 1979 to 1986 in each region, division or island authority in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information is as follows:

Paramilitary Activity (Deaths)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many persons have been (a) killed and (b) injured in Scotland in the first six months of the current year as a result of paramilitary activity; and if he will break down the figures specifying whether the paramilitary were (i) from Western Europe, (ii) from Northern Ireland, (iii) from the Republic of Ireland, (iv) from other parts of the world and (v) of unknown origin.

Mr. John MacKay: No such deaths or injuries occurred in Scotland in the first six months of 1986.

Prisoners (Transfers)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many prisoners were transferred from (a) Scotland to Northern Ireland and (b) Northern Ireland to Scotland in the first six months of the current year; and under which section of the Criminal Justice Act 1961 such transfers were carried out.

Mr. John MacKay: Two prisoners were transferred permanently from Scotland to Northern Ireland under Section 26(1), and one prisoner was transferred temporarily, for a period of 15 days, from Northern Ireland to Scotland under Section 27(1), of the Criminal Justice Act 1961 in the first six months of this year.

The permanent transfer of another prisoner from Scotland to Northern Ireland under Section 26(1) of the Act was also agreed during the same period, but the actual transfer has still to take place.

Fur Production

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many establishments known to him in Scotland were used for the raising of animals for the production of fur, by species, in each of the last five years.

Mr. John MacKay: The only figures known to my right hon. and learned Friend for establishments which rear animals for the production of fur in Scotland are those for mink farms licensed annually for the purposes of the Destructive Imported Animals Act 1932. The licences issued in each of the financial years 1981-82 to 1985-86 were respectively 14, 13, 10 8 and 8.

Court of Session (Delays)

Mr. John Smith asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the increase in the number and extent of delays which are occurring in the hearing of cases in the Court of Session in the latest convenient 12 months period as compared with earlier similar periods; and what action is proposed to reduce such delays.

Mr. Rifkind: No statistics of the kind requested are available but the report of the review body on use of judicial time in the superior courts in Scotland records that the average intervals between fixing and commencing hearings for the main categories of business are as follows:

Categories of Civil Business	Current Average Interval
Appeals	12 months
Jury Trials	15 months
Non-Consistorial Proofs	15 months
Defended Consistorial Proofs	12 months

The report, which was published on 18 July, makes a number of recommendations which I have discussed already with the Lord President of the Court of Session, many of which he is currently in the process of implementing. On those requiring primary legislation I have written to interested bodies and organisations inviting comments by 31 August.

Scottish Women's Aid

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the amount of grant aid allocated to Scottish Women's Aid in 1985-86; and what sum is proposed for the current financial year.

Mr. John MacKay: Revenue grants made to Scottish Women's Aid, including the expenses of a children's worker and a training liaison officer, amounted to £63,563 in 1985-86. A grant of £505 for capital equipment was paid in addition.

In 1986-87 revenue grants amounting to £64,467 have been offered but the position is being reconsidered following recent discussions with the organisation.

Dog Licences

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what income was received from dog licences in Scotland in 1985-6; what was the cost of collection; how many licences were issued; and what progress has been made in establishing a self-financing system.

Mr. Ancram: Final figures for 1985-86 are not yet available. On the basis of an estimate of 173,000 licences, the income for that year has been estimated at £64,010 and the cost of collection at £258,635.

After careful consideration, the Government have decided to introduce legislation to abolish the dog licence when a suitable opportunity arises.

Student Finance

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what consultations he intends to conduct in Scotland during the review of student finance; and whether he has any plans to publish the results of the review.

Mr. Rifkind: Organisations in Scotland concerned with education at undergraduate level will be specifically invited to submit written evidence, and in addition it will be open to any group or individual to make representations.

As was announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science in his statement on 18 June at columns 1046-47 the outcome of the review will be published for public consultation.

Students (Planning Courses)

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many students are currently studying on planning courses on Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 11 July 1986, c. 300]: In 1984-5, which is the latest year for which final figures are available, there were 492 full-time and 157 part-time students on planning courses in universities and central institutions in Scotland.

Dounreay

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if the Nature Conservancy Council has submitted written evidence to the public inquiry considering the expansion of facilities at Dounreay; and if he will instruct the Nature Conservancy Council to appear before the inquiry.

Mr. Ancram [pursuant to his reply, 21 July 1986, c. 30]: The Nature Conservancy Council lodged a written submission on 11 March 1986. The council stated that it did not wish to appear or be represented at the Dounreay inquiry. Its submission has, however, been made available to parties at the inquiry and has been referred to in evidence. My right hon. and learned Friend does not have power at this stage of the inquiry to require the appearance of a representative of the council: the reporter whom my right hon. and learned Friend appointed has such power but it is not his intention to exercise it.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Visitors

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Lord Privy Seal what is his estimate of the increase in the number of public visiting the Palace of Westminster over the last 10 years; what is his estimate of the resultant increased cost to public funds; whether he is satisfied with the necessary security arrangements; if he will raise with the Services Committee the possibility of placing a box for voluntary contributions towards the upkeep of the Palace at points of ingress and egress; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen [pursuant to his reply, 22 July 1986]: Since 1979 the number of visitors to the Palace of Westminster, apart from visitors to the Public Gallery, has been restricted to those who are either sponsored by a Member of both Houses, or who come as guests of those who work here. In 1985 the Palace of Westminster was visited by about a quarter of the number of visitors in 1975. The Services Committee has always taken a keen interest in the number of visitors on the line of route and for a variety of reasons, since 1979, this number has been restricted to a maximum of 1,000 on any one day. The security arrangements are kept continually under review.

Successive Administrations have accepted that the costs of the upkeep of the Palace of Westminster, which include the cost of controlling visits, are a legitimate charge on public funds.

ENERGY

Nuclear Fuel

Mr. Robin Cook asked the Secretary of State for Energy how much of the depleted uranium stockpile has been re-enriched for use in British or foreign nuclear programmes since 1956.

Mr. Goodlad: I am asking the chairman of BNFL to write to the hon. Member.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will set out in tabular form (a) the amount of magnox spent fuel reprocessed arising from the Latina and Tokoi Mura reactors and imported for processing in the United Kingdom, (b) the amounts of magnox spent nuclear fuel reprocessed arising from the electricity board reactors for each year since 1963;

(2) if magnox spent fuel from Latina and Tokoi Mura reactors has ever been co-processed with spent nuclear fuel from Calder Hall and Chapel Cross reactors.

Mr. Goodlad: These are operational matters for British Nuclear Fuels plc.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will now publish the text of the safeguards agreement concluded on 3 June between Her Majesty's Government and the European Commission concerning the application of safeguards to the magnox reprocessing material balance area at Sellafield.

Mr. Goodlad: I have nothing to add to my right hon. Friend's reply to the hon. Member of 12 June, at column 268-69.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) whether the United Kingdom-European Commission agreement on the safeguarding of civil nuclear material flows through Sellafield contains provisions for continuous physical nuclear safeguards;

(2) what provisions are in force to ensure that magnox spent nuclear fuel from Latina in Italy and Tokai Mura in Japan are open to continuous physical nuclear safeguards when being reprocessed at Sellafield.

Mr. Goodlad: I refer to the answer given to the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) on 14 July at column 388.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will consider publishing, weekly, until December, an input-output table of spent magnox nuclear fuel and depleted uranium/plutonium stocks arising from the throughput at the Windscale works B205 reprocessing plant at British Nuclear Fuels, Sellafield.

Mr. Goodlad: In this period the plant will handle material from the United Kingdom's defence reactors and the information cannot therefore be given.

Electricity Supply Industry

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on his policy towards the privatisation of the electricity supply industry in the light of the Electrical Power Engineers' Association document entitled "Public or Private Electricity—The American Experience", a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. Goodlad: I shall read the EPEA report with interest. As has been made clear on a number of occasions, the Government have no present plans to privatise the electricity supply industry.

Coal Industry

Mr. Woodcock asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what is his estimate of the contribution made to National Coal Board profits by royalties paid by private mine operators; and whether he has any plans to review the basis of royalty payments;

(2) what information he has to how many coal merchanting businesses have been acquired by the National Coal Board or its subsidiaries since 1979; and what annual tonnages of coal those businesses were retailing when acquired;

(3) what information he has as to how many disposals of coal merchanting businesses there have been by the National Coal Board since 1979 and as to what tonnages of coal they represent;

(4) what is his estimate of the annual profits in each of the years since 1979 which National Fuel Distributors Ltd. has derived from supplying smokeless fuels to concessionaires.

Mr. David Hunt: These subjects are matters for British Coal to advise on and I have asked the chairman to write to the hon. Member.

Sellafield

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether there have been any further official assessments of the implications of the 1957 Windscale fire since the Fleck committee reports.

Mr. Goodlad: The National Radiological Protection Board published "An assessment of the radiological impact of the Windscale fire October 1957" (R135) in November 1982, and an addendum to that report in September 1983. In addition, there have been a number of detailed technical studies relating to different aspects of this subject, many of which are listed in that NRPB report.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will reconsider his decision not to place in the Library copies of accountancy records of the reprocessing batch from which the liquor discharged from Sellafield on 23 January originated.

Mr. Goodlad: No.

Nuclear Reactors

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make available to hon. Members all reports and assessments made by his Department since 1979 on the effects of a maximum credible nuclear accident at the four Calder Hall nuclear reactors on the contnued operation of the Sellafield nuclear reprocessing and waste handling activities after such an accident.

Mr. Goodlad: There have been no such reports and assessments made by the Department of Energy. Safety is the responsibility of the operator, overseen by the Health and Safety Executive's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate.

Voltage Variations

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many representations he has received relating to voltage variations in each of the past three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: I have received very few representations on this matter, which is within the operational responsibility of the electricity supply industry.

Advance Petroleum Revenue Tax

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will assess the effect on the viability of marginal oilfields and further North sea development work of the immediate repayment of advance petroleum revenue tax, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: A number of oil companies have raised with me issues concerning the APRT and its effects on their cash flows and ability to fund existing and new United Kingdom continental shelf developments.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Sickness Benefit

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the implications of his proposals to remove the right to part rate sickness benefit for those with less than full contribution records on their qualification for invalidity benefit.

Mr. Newton: Our proposals in the Social Security Bill mean that people who currently become entitled to invalidity benefit through receiving part-rate sickness benefit will no longer be able to do so. It is estimated that in an average year about 6,500 people will be affected. It is further estimated that over 70 per cent. of these will be entitled to other benefits (such as severe disabled allowance and/or supplementary benefit) either in their own right, or as a dependant of a beneficiary.

Mortgage Interest

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the estimated impact of the Government proposals to limit the proportion of mortgage interest to be met during the initial period of benefit on the living standards of those affected;

(2) what has been the response of the building societies to the Government's proposals to limit the proportion of mortgage interest to be met during the initial period of benefit;

(3) what impact the proposals for individuals to pay a proportion of rates and mortgage interest is expected to have on the level of repossessions; and what is the estimated cost to the social security budget of possible increased bed and breakfast accommodation.

Mr. Newton: The proposals concerning supplementary benefit for mortgage interest during the first six months on benefit have been referred to the Social Security Advisory Committee for consultation. Final decisions will be taken in the light of the Committee's report, which we have not yet received. We would not however expect proposals along the lines referred to have a significant impact on standards of living of those affected, on the level of repossessions or on the use of bed and breakfast accommodation. Claimants over age 60 would not be affected; in other cases, half the interest would continue to be paid during a period of up to six months on benefit, and anyone whose claim lasted more than six months would receive full help with interest payments after that period, as well as extra payments for any additional interest on a higher outstanding amount due to the limitation. It is estimated that the proposed change would add about £200 to the outstanding loan in the average case where a claim lasted for the full six months. Many claims do not, however, last this long

While the Building Societies Association has made it clear that it does not support the proposals, it indicated in its response to the social security Green Paper that it would respond to any changes sympathetically and continue to help as many people as possible into owning their own homes. I understand that the association has responded to the SSAC's invitation to comment on the proposals, and the committee will no doubt take account of its views in preparing its report.

Disabled People (Survey)

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys survey of disabled people will be published.

Mr. Newton: Publication of the full results of the survey is expected in 1988. The Office of Population Censuses and Surveys has made good progress. By the end of last year, it had successfully completed interviewing in relation to nationally representative samples of adults and children with significant disabilities living in private households. I am grateful to the many disabled people and their families who have given so generously of their time, and to the organisations who represent them for their constructive contributions throughout the research programme. That valued assistance continues during the design of this year's research, which is to cover people in residential care. OPCS will conduct interviews in relation to a representative sample of disabled adults in communal establishments; and to enable the Department to decide whether interviewing should subsequently be extended to disabled children permanently resident in institutions, OPCS will first establish their number by means of a postal census. Processing and analysis of the data from last year's fieldwork has begun and the survey results will, as the Government's White Paper indicated, provide the evidence needed to support a comprehensive review of benefits for sick and disabled people.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people claimed supplementary benefit in Denton and Reddish and Gorton and Stockport, North constituencies in (a) 1979 and (b) 1985; what percentage change that represents; and what was the percentage change in (i) staff handling supplementary benefit and (ii) all staff at his Department's local offices for the same period.

Mr. Major: Denton and Reddish constituency is covered by four of the Department's offices, Hyde, Stockport, South, Stockport, North and Ashton under Lyne. Stockport, North constituency is covered by Stockport, South and Stockport, North and Gorton constituency is covered by the offices at Rusholme, Longsight and Openshaw. In each case the boundaries of the offices are not conterminous with the boundary of the constituency.

Comprehensive figures are not available before 1982-83 and information on the number of individuals who claimed supplementary benefit is not available in the form requested.

Direct comparisons between numbers of staff and claims are misleading as work loads vary considerably by type and duration of claim and the action that has to be taken. All these factors vary over time as a result of legislative, policy and procedural changes. Examples of such changes are the introduction of housing benefit and postal claim forms.

Direct comparisons between numbers of staff and claims are misleading as workloads vary considerably by type and duration of claim and the action that has to be taken. All these factors vary over time as a result of legislative, policy and procedural changes. Examples of such changes are the introduction of housing benefit and postal claim forms.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people claimed supplementary benefit in the Monklands, West constituency in (a) 1979 and (b) 1985; what percentage change that represents; and what was the percentage change in (i) staff handling supplementary benfit and (ii) all staff at the local offices of his Department over the same period.

Mr. Major: Monklands, West is covered by five of the Department's offices, Cumbernauld, Coatbridge Area Office, Coatbridge national insurance office, Glasgow Springburn AO and Glasgow Springburn NIO. Their boundaries are not conterminous with the boundary of the constituency. The national insurance offices do not deal with supplementary benefit.

Information on the number of individuals who claimed supplementary benefit is not available in the form requested.

Information that is available for the offices is as follows:

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people in the Islington, North constituency claimed supplementary benefit in 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984, 1985 and in 1986, January to June.

Mr. Major: Islington, North constituency is covered by three of the Department's offices Hoxton, Finsbury Park and Highgate but their boundaries are not conterminous with those of the constituency.

Information is available only in relation to the number of new and repeat claims processed by local offices and figures are collected for the period April to April each year. No details are available for years before 1982-83.

The total numbers of claims processed by these three offices for the years 1982-83, 1983-84, 1984-85, 1985-86 and the numbers to date for 1986 were as follows:

Year	Number
1982-83	50,023

Mr. McCartney asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people claimed supplementary benefit

Mr. Major: Clydebank and Milngavie is covered by two of the Department's offices, Clydebank and Glasgow (Maryhill). Their boundaries are not conterminous with the boundary of the constituency.

Information on the number of individuals who claimed supplementary benefit is not available in the form requested. Information that is available for the offices is as follows:

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has had any representations on the limits on supplementary benefit payments made to maintain physically or mentally handicapped individuals in residential or nursing homes.

Mr. Newton: Since April last year, when the present arrangements where introduced, we have received representations from many organisations with an interest in the provision of residential and nursing care for the physically and mentally handicapped. We have also received representations from some interested individuals. Such representations have been taken into account in the changes made in the supplementary benefit limits in November 1985, and those coming into force on 28 July.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to ensure that social security offices are empowered, in circumstances where they are satisfied that a real and urgent need exists, to provide first time single householders, without dependants, who are in receipt of supplementary benefit, with financial assistance through his single payments system towards the cost of obtaining those basic items of furnishing and household equipment needed to enable them to live independently in their own homes.

Mr. Newton: Under the revised rules contained in the Supplementary Benefit (Miscellaneous Amendments) Regulations 1986 laid before the House on 21 July, single childless householders setting up home for the first time will be eligible for furniture and bedding payments, including the flat rate payment for miscellaneous needs in the following circumstances; moving for a reason specified in regulation 13(1) (payment of removal expenses); leaving prison, hospital after one year, or young person leaving local authority care; moving as part of a planned programme of resettlement or rehabilitation from a resettlement unit or special care hostel or group home; and refugees from abroad. In other circumstances, elderly and disabled claimants will be able to get help without time limits for the revised list of specified furniture items other than the miscellaneous needs payments. Payment for specified furniture items subject to the same exception can also be considered under regulation 30 where the adjudication officer considers such a payment is the only means by which serious damage or serious risk to health or safety can be avoided.

I understand that the Chief Adjudication Officer will shortly be issuing guidance on the revised rules. A copy will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Forrester asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people claimed supplementary benefit in Stoke-on-Trent, North constituency in (a) 1979 and (b) 1985; what percentage change that represents; what was the percentage change in (i) staff handling supplementary benefit and (ii) all staff at local offices of his Department over the same period.

Mr. Major: Stoke-on-Trent, North is covered by one one of the Department's offices, Stoke North ILO but the office's boundary is not conterminous with the boundary of the constituency.

Comprehensive figures are not available before 1980-81 and no information is available on the number of individuals who claimed supplementary benefit throughout the year.

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people claimed supplementary benefit in the Rother Valley constituency in (a) 1979 and (b) 1985; what percentage change this represents; and what was the percentage change in (i) staff handling supplementary benefit and (ii) all staff at the local offices of his Department for the same period.

Mr. Major: Rother Valley is covered by two of the Department's offices, Rotherham North and Rotherham South, but their boundaries are not conterminous with the boundary of the constituency.

Means-tested Benefits

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all the benefits in cash or in kind for which his Department is wholly or partly responsible which are means-tested.

Mr. Major: Supplementary benefit and family income supplement are the principal income-related benefits administered by the Department of Health and Social Security. Receipt can also give passported entitlement to other benefits such as free school meals. The Department also administers low-income schemes which provide help with National Health Service charges, travelling expenses and welfare foods, and has policy responsibility for housing benefit, which is administered by local authorities.

Rent and Rate Rebates and Allowances

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what payments were made by his Department for (a) rate rebates, (b) rent rebates and (c) rent allowances in 1985-86; and what are his latest estimates for these figures for 1986-87 for the (i) Burnley borough council, (ii) Pendle borough council, (iii) Hyndburn borough council and (iv) Rossendale borough council.

Mr. Major: Payments on account made by the Department to these authorities for benefits granted under the housing benefit scheme in 1985-86 and estimated payments to be made in the year 1986-87 are:

£ million

	Rate Rebate		Rate Rebates		Rent Allowances
	1985-86	1986-87	1985-86	1986-87	1985-86	1986-87

Hyndburn BC	1·3	1·4	2·4	2·6	0·7	0·8
Rossendale BC	1·1	1·1	2·7	2·9	0·4	0·6

These figures are based on the Councils' estimated expenditure and are subject to revision following submission of their final subsidy claims.

Prescription Items

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his answer of 11 July, to what factors he attributes the fall in the number of prescription items between 1984 and 1985.

Mr. Hayhoe: The table I provided on 11 July showed that in the past 10 years the general trend has been for the number of prescription items dispensed to increase. Although occasionally there may be variations in this trend there is no firm evidence to identify any particular cause.

Students (Benefits)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what welfare benefits students are eligible to claim in connection with illness; and what is the cost to public funds.

Mr. Major: A student who is ill may qualify for sickness benefit or supplementary benefit, subject to the normal rules. No separate records are kept of claims from sick students.

Board and Lodging Allowance

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement about the reasons for paying board and lodging allowance at a rate of £247·50 per week from August 1986 to the British Home and Hospital for Incurables for the care of a stroke victim under the age of 65 years and £187·50 per week for a stroke victim over the age of 65 years.

Mr. Newton: Younger physically disabled people, some of whom may be multiply handicapped and very young, generally have a wider variety of care needs and thus higher costs than people whose disability occurs later in life. The maximum amount of supplementary benefit which may be paid to physically disabled people in nursing homes, whose disability arose under pension age, has therefore been set at a higher level (currently £230 and from 28 July £247·50 for a nursing home in the Greater London area) than the maximum amount for elderly people. As I have made clear to the House on a number of occasions, we are looking at whether practicable arrangements allowing greater flexibility can be devised.

Supplementary Pensions

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much was spent on supplementary pensions in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Major: I refer the hon. Member to table 3.15 on pages 224-225 of volume II of "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1986-87 to 1988-89" (Cmnd. 9702), a copy of which is in the Library.

Nurses (Pay)

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to how many nurses earn less than £120 per week following the 1986 pay award; what proportion of total nursing, midwifery and health visiting staff this represents; and if he will break down the figures into grades.

Mr. Hayhoe: Nurse basic pay rates went up on average by 7·8 per cent. on 1 July 1986. I regret that information on the detail of nurse earnings following that increase is not yet available.

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the current basic minimum and maximum salary of (a) a nursing auxiliary, (b) an enrolled nurse and (c) a pupil-student nurse; what it was in December 1974 expressed in current prices; and what percentage increases would be necessary to give the 1986 salary a purchasing value equal to that of 1974.

Mr. Hayhoe: Pay levels in the grades concerned would need to be reduced by up to 16 per cent. to return them to their 1974 value in real terms. This calculation ignores the further benefit of the 2½ hour reduction in the working week in 1980-81.

The detailed information requested is as follows:

	Annual basic pay salary as at 1 July 1986		Annual basic pay salary as at December 1974 expressed at current prices†*		Percentage change needed to give 1986 salary real value of 1974 salary

Family Income Supplement

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the number of families receiving family income supplement in 1979 and each subsequent year and the average amount of benefit received: (a) in cash terms and (b) in real terms.

Mr. Major: The information is as follows:

Year (April)	All families (thousands)	Av. weekly payment (cash terms) £	Av. weekly payment (real terms) (At April 1979 prices) £
1979	78	5.20	5.20

Patient-Doctor Ratio

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the patient to doctor ratio in (a) the Burnley constituency, (b) the Hyndburn constituency, (c) the Pendle constituency and (d) the Rossendale constituency; and what is the average figure for England as a whole.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that not all of the information requested is available centrally. The number of doctors per 100,000 population for hospital and community health services in England is 85·7 whole-time equivalents. The average list size for general practitioners is 2,068. The hon. Member may wish to make inquiries of North-Western regional health authority and Lancashire family practitioner committee for the more detailed local information he seeks.

Leukaemia

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about the progress of the study by the Office of Population, Censuses and Surveys into the incidence of leukaemia and related cancer in the areas around nuclear power stations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: Several inquiries have been received but I am not yet in a position to give an expected date of publication of the report.

Eye Testing

Mr. Bright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many ophthalmic opticians have the necessary equipment to carry out tests for intraocular pressure and of visual fields.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Mr. Bright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether tests of intraocular pressure and visual fields form part of the routine sight tests carried out by ophthalmic opticians for the National Health Service; and if he has any plans to extend these.

Mr. Hayhoe: It is not considered necessary to require opticians to include these as part of the routine National Health Service sight test, although it is open to ophthalmic opticians to carry out whatever tests they judge to be appropriate in individual cases. There are no plans to change the arrangements for the provision of National Health Service sight tests.

Glaucoma

Mr. Bright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which specialist tests for glaucoma are beyond the competence of ophthalmic opticians.

Mr. Hayhoe: Ophthalmic opticians are trained in many of the techniques for detecting symptoms of glaucoma. However diagnosis would be a matter for the responsible ophthalmologist.

Mr. Bright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied with the effectiveness of the testing procedures for the blood relatives of sufferers from glaucoma.

Mr. Hayhoe: Facilities for the detection and treatment of glaucoma provided in hospital eye departments are the responsibility of individual health authorities. I understand that ophthalmologists would normally advise glaucoma sufferers that their first degree relatives over the age of 40 should be screened.

Mr. Bright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases of glaucoma were positively identified by ophthalmic opticians in routine National Health Service eye tests in 1983, 1984 and 1985.

Mr. Hayhoe: Diagnosis of disease is a matter for qualified medical practitioners. Ophthalmic opticians are, however, required to inform patients' doctors of any indication of disease they detect in the course of the National Health Service sight test. I regret that information is not available on the number of such referrals.

Cervical Cancer (Wandsworth)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many women have died of cervical cancer in Wandsworth in each year since 1979; and what is the national average figure for a comparable area.

Mr. Hayhoe: The number of deaths to women usually resident in Wandsworth with an underlying cause of death of malignant neoplasm of cervix uteri (ICD(9) 180) in each year since 1979 is shown in the table. Allowing for differences in age distribution, the mortality from cervical cancer has been on average 1 per cent. lower in Wandsworth than in England and Wales as a whole over this period, or 4 per cent. lower than in the combined group of all London boroughs and metropolitan county districts. Such differences are within the range of variation that could well occur from chance alone.

Cigarette Advertising

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he intends to publish annual reports of the committees to monitor the operation of the new voluntary agreement with the tobacco industry regarding cigarette advertising and health warnings.

Mr. Whitney: The terms of the voluntary agreement provide that the chairman's annual report may be published at the discretion of Ministers and after consultation with the Tobacco Advisory Council and the Imported Tobacco Products Advisory Council. Accordingly, we shall consider publication when the first report becomes available next year.

Benefits

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the cost of paying unemployment benefit to persons between the ages of 60 and 65 years whose benefit is exhausted or who are currently disqualified because their contribution record is inadequate, but excluding females who are entitled to a state pension, and the saving in other benefits and additional yield of tax; and what adjustment should be made to these figures if those with an occupational pension but no state pension were to be excluded from drawing unemployment benefit.

Mr. Major: I regret that the information requested is not available. No records are kept of the number of unemployed persons over 60 years who are not receiving benefits and who are not required to sign at the unemployment benefit office for credits.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is his estimate of the saving in benefits including housing benefit if (a) child benefit were increased to (i) £15 and (ii) £20 per week and (b) unemployment pay was also paid to all those below pensionable age without work and able and willing to work;

(2) what is his estimate of the number of children in families in receipt of social security; how this compares with the number in 1973 and 1979; and what is his estimate of the numbers which could be taken out of social security if (a) child benefit were increased to (i) £15 and (ii) £20 per week and (b) in addition unemployment pay was payable to all those below pensionable age without work and able and willing to work.

Mr. Newton: Increases in child benefit would reduce the number of families in receipt of supplementary benefit, rather than social security as a whole. The number of children in families in receipt of supplementary benefit is as follows:

	Number
1973	780,000
1979	920,000
1984	1,950,000

I regret that the other information requested can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the number of children eligible for child benefit, the number for whom benefit is being paid, the number of families receiving benefit and the distribution by family size, the number of families receiving one-parent benefit, the estimated gross cost in the current year of both kinds of benefit and the estimated cost if child benefit were to be increased to (i) £15 and (ii) £20 per week together with the estimated savings on other programmes, including housing benefit.

Mr. Newton: In December 1984 child benefit was paid for 12,346,000 eligible children, in 6,881,000 families, with the following distribution by family size:

	'000
Families with—
One child	2,895
2 children	2,865
3 children	858
4 children	197
5 children	48
6 or more children	18

In December 1984 517,000 families received one-parent benefit. The estimated gross costs in 1986-87 are £4,425 million for child benefit and £148 million for one-parent benefit. In a full year the gross cost of child benefit at £15 a week would be £9,496 million, and at £20 a week, £12,661 million. To calculate the estimated savings on other programmes following these increases would incur disproportionate cost.

Social Security Budget

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing, in terms of current prices, expenditure under the social security budget in the current financial year under the heads set out in the answer to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby on 18 July 1985, Official Report, column 237.

Mr. Newton: The information requested is as follows:

Social security benefit expenditure 1986-87 (estimated)

	£ million
Retirement pension	17,840
Non-contributory retirement pension	37
Widows benefits	828
Unemployment benefit	1,530

Invalid care allowance	15
Severe disablement allowance	303

Maternity benefits	197
Benefits paid in respect of children*	4,575
Family income supplement	158

War pensions	572
Supplementary benefit	7,264
Housing benefit	4,678
Total social security benefits	42,627

* Child benefit, one parent benefit, guardian's allowance and child's special allowance.

This information, in somewhat more detailed form, is provided annually in the social security chapter of the Government's public expenditure White Paper.

Yttrium-Aluminium-Garnet Lasers

Sir Ian Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to how many hospitals in the United Kingdom are equipped with yttrium-aluminium-garnet lasers for use in ophthalmic surgery.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that the information requested is not held centrally but I understand that a reasonable estimate would be between 20 and 30.

St. Helens and Knowsley District Health Authority

Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the amount of resources made available to St. Helens and Knowsley district health authorities.

Mr. Hayhoe: A total of £534 million revenue expenditure was made available to Mersey regional health authority for the year 1986-87, which is an increase of 6 per cent. over its 1985-86 funding. The allocation of resources to St. Helens and Knowsley health authority is determined by the region. The hon. Member may therefore wish to contact the regional chairman for the information he seeks.

Single and Homeless Persons (Care Facilities)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to seek to improve the general medical care facilities available to patients who are single and homeless; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: General medical services are available to all, but some homeless people experience difficulty in presenting for, or obtaining treatment. Two pilot schemes have been established, one in Tower Hamlets and the other in Camden, which are taking primary health care to homeless people in the places where they congregate. The longer-term objective is to encourage people to register on the list of a general medical practitioner whenever this is practicable.

Darwen Caller Office

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the north-west regional office of his Department has now received comments from all interested parties concerning the proposed closure of the Darwen caller office; what has been the general nature of those comments; and when a decision on the future of the office will be made.

Mr. Major Comments have been received from most of the interested parties who have been consulted. In general, they are concerned with the value of retaining a facility locally for face to face contact with the Department and the travelling difficulties which the public may encounter in visiting the main office in Blackburn, as well as the status of the town of Darwen.

A decision on the future of this caller office will be made soon.

Unemployment Review

Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has any plans to change the arrangements for unemployment review in his Department.

Mr. Fowler: Unemployment review officers are responsible both for giving advice and help to unemployed people on finding work, and for preventing abuse. These functions have been undertaken by the Department of Health and Social Security because of its responsibility for paying supplementary benefit to unemployed people.

My noble Friend the Secretary of State for Employment has now introduced nationwide the restart scheme which involves calling the 1·3 million people unemployed for a year or more for individual counselling interviews at jobcentres. This advice and help means there is a considerable overlap with the existing work of unemployment review officers. My noble Friend the Secretary of State for Employment and I have therefore concluded, with the agreement of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, that the function of unemployment review should be transferred to the Department of Employment. We expect the transfer to be completed by April next year.

Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list, from 1970 to date, the number of cases in each year referred to him where it is alleged that a local authority has been in default of its duties under section 2 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970;

(2) if he will list, from 1970 to date, the number of cases in each year investigated by him where it is alleged that a local authority has been in default of its duties under section 2 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970; in how many cases the local authority was found to be in default; and what action he took in any such case.

Mr. Newton: The number of cases referred to the Secretary of State since 1978 where it is alleged that a local authority has been in default of its duties under section 2 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970 are as follows:

	Number
1978	6
1979	4
1980	5
1981	20
1982	3
1983	3
1984	5
1985	7
1986	1

In none of the cases in which investigations were completed was it judged necessary for my right hon. Friend to exercise his default powers. Inquiries are continuing on six complaints.

Information about complaints before 1978 could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many local authorities are subject to the functions imposed by section 2 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970; and what information he has, for each year since 1970, as to how many people were registered in total pursuant to section 1(1) of the Act as being persons to whom that section applies.

Mr. Newton: All of the 109 social services departments in England are subject to the functions imposed by section 2 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970.

Section 1(1) of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970 requires local authorities to inform themselves of the number of persons within their area to whom section 29 of the National Assistance Act 1948 applies. The number of persons registered under section 29 since 1970 are given in the table.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the number of cases in which court proceedings have been instituted under the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970.

Mr. Newton: We are aware of five cases where court proceedings have been initiated in connection with complaints of alleged failure by local authorities to comply with the requirements of section 2 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act. The Department would not necessarily be aware of court proceedings to which they were not a party.

National Assistance Act 1948

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list, from 1970 to date, how many complaints were made to him of alleged defaults by local authorities under section 36 of the National Assistance Act 1948, indicating in how many cases the local authority was found to be in default and what action he took in respect of any such case.

Mr. Newton: Apart from complaints in connection with the provisions of section 2 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970, the Department is aware of only one request since June 1982 to consider action under section 36 of the National Assistance Act 1948 in respect of an alleged failure by a local authority to fulfil its statutory obligation under the Act. The case was resolved without recourse by my right hon. Friend to use of his default powers. Information on any complaints in earlier years could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Drugs (Safety)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) pursuant to his answer, Official Report, 14 July, if he will list the five drugs which have had the largest cumulative number of adverse reaction reports over the last six months; and if he will indicate which of these have resulted in deaths possibly associated with the drug;

(2) pursuant to the answer, Official Report, 14 July, column 422, of the eight drugs whose licences or certificates were withdrawn, how many had (a) been on the market for over five years and (b) had at some time over 1 million prescriptions issued for them in one year; and, for the drugs falling into either of these two categories, how many months the committee spent in evaluating safety before the decision was taken to revoke the licence or certificate.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the right hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to the answers of 14 July, Official Report, column 422, if he will reconcile his statement that the Committee on Safety of Medicines is at present actively assessing the safety of seven drugs which had over one million prescriptions issued for them in 1984 with his statement that of the 14 drugs whose safety has been discussed by the Committee on Safety of Medicines in the last year, only one had had over 1 million prescriptions issued and another one had had over 2 million issued, with the figures for number of prescriptions of the other drugs being less than one million or not available.

Mr. Hayhoe: The two sets of information given in my reply to the right hon. Member on 14 July at columns 421-22, related to separate questions about different time periods.

AIDS

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what amount will be allocated for the projected budget on acquired immune defficiency syndrome expenditure for the next three years.

Mr. Hayhoe: Decisions on central spending in future years will be taken in the light of the public expenditure survey. Health authorities have also been asked to prepare plans for future services for AIDS as part of their short term programmes to be submitted by the end of the year.

Community Care

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his assessment of the effect of the Opportunities for Volunteering Scheme on community care for the mentally ill, mentally handicapped and the elderly; which health authorities have used this scheme for community care; how many volunteers have been involved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: The opportunities for volunteering scheme is aimed at developing opportunities for unemployed people to undertake voluntary work and to expand voluntary work in the health and personal social services generally. Overall, the indications are that 40,000 or so unemployed people have participated in about 1,200 local projects of benefit to people who need support in the community. While of the 700 or so projects current at any one time, about 6 per cent. are specifically designed to help mentally ill people, 8 per cent. to help mentally handicapped people and 25 per cent. to help elderly people, other more general projects are also of benefit to people in these groups. Grants under the scheme are not available to health or other statutory authorities; these have access to other sources of funds.

Tobacco Industry (Agreement)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how members of the public can obtain copies of the text of the new voluntary agreement with the tobacco companies.

Mr. Whitney: copies of the agreement are available from the Department on request.

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has sent copies of his new voluntary agreement with the tobacco industry to all distict health authorities.

Mr. Whitney: Copies have been sent to those health authorites that have asked for them. In addition, the agreement was widely distributed to district health education officers for a recent conference organised by Action on Smoking and Health.

Glucose Testing Strips

Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the annual cost of making glucose testing strips prescribable by general practitioners.

Mr. Hayhoe: The cost is estimated at between £5 million and £10 million per annum.

Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if his Department has estimated the potential long-term savings to the National Health Services from changes in the level of reduced hospitalisation if glucose testing strips were prescribable by general practitioners

Mr. Hayhoe: Blood glucose testing strips can be prescribed for patients through the hospital services. It is possible that wider use could enable some patients to achieve better control of their condition, so avoiding the complications that lead to hospital treatment but no reliable estimate can be made of the overall net effect on national health service costs.

Diabetics (Syringes)

Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to allow general practitioners to prescribe plastic syringes to diabetics up to the equivalent cost of glass syringes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Road Accidents (Records System)

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his policy concerning the introduction of a computerised accident and emergency record system for road accident epidemiological use.

Mr. Whitney: It is for individual health authorities to determine the scope of all National Health Service hospital records. The Department has not issued any guidance on the detailed content of record systems used in accident and emergency departments nor on the extent to which accident types should be separately recorded.

Fuel Payment

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a table showing (a) the number of and (b) the total payments made during the first three months of the current year to help those on social security with fuel payments during periods of exceptionally severe weather, in each of the offices of his Department in Wales.

Mr. Major: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) on 18 July at column 663.

Statistics (Publication)

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, further to his statement in the House on 11 February that it was planned to publish the 1986 edition of "Health and Personal Social Services Statistics for England" during the summer of 1986, if he is now able to give a date for publication.

Mr. Whitney: "Health and Personal Social Services Statistics for England 1986" edition was published on 22 July 1986. Copies have been placed in the Library.

Dental Amalgam

Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has yet received any advice from either the Committee on Toxicity or the Committee on Dental and Surgical Materials on the use of dental amalgam in fillings.

Mr. Hayhoe: The advice of the Committee on Toxicity was as follows:

"Dental amalgams containing mercury have been used for 150 years and we understand that in the United Kingdom some 30 million amalgam restorations are inserted each year. Despite this extensive usage only a very few cases that can be recognised as having any reaction to mercury occur each year, and these are due to hypersensitivity. Nevertheless, from time to time concern is expressed in some quarters that use of dental amalgam may lead to excessive exposure to mercury and to poisoning.

We have examined the evidence from which such concern arises. There is some evidence that mercury is released from dental amalgam during the period following insertion and on the removal of the restorations. Some mercury may be released as a result of corrosion but this is likely to be small because of the excess of unreacted alloy in the finished filling. The development of copper enriched alloys has reduced the potential for corrosion. Vapourisation of mercury from amalgam restoration may possibly occur with prolonged heavy chewing. However, long term clinical evidence would seem to suggest the view that substantial amounts of mercury are not released from amalgam fillings.

Theoretical considerations suggest that in extreme cases the amount of mercury released might, were it known to be absorbed, constitute an undesirable although not a toxic exposure. However, studies of the concentration of mercury in the blood of people with amalgam restorations indicate to us that the exposure is in fact of no toxicocological significance. It has been suggested also that exposure to mercury from amalgam may be a factor in the development of some chronic diseases, but in our opinion the evidence does not support this contention.

In our opinion the use of dental amalgam is free from risk of systematic toxicity and only a very few cases of hypersensitivity occur. It is our view that further research in this area would not merit priority."

Medicines Commission (Report)

Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to receive the Medicines Commission's annual report for 1985.

Mr. Whitney: I have received the report and copies have today been laid before both Houses of Parliament, in accordance with section 5(2) of the Medicines Act 1968. Bound volumes will be placed in the Library, and will also be available to hon. Members from the Vote Office, containing the 1985 reports of the Medicines Commission, the Committee on Safety of Medicines, the Veterinary Products Committee, the British Pharmacopoeia Commission, the Committee on the Review of Medicines and the Committee on Dental and Surgical Materials.

Labour Statistics (Liverpool)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why, in answer to the hon. Member for Birkenhead on 15 May, Official Report column 527, the total number of unemployed claimants in the city of Liverpool in November 1985 was given as 32,100 when figures published by the Department of Employment for the same date gave a total of 56,421.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1986, c. 418]: The figures published by the Department of Employment were for the city of Liverpool local authority area. Figures for unemployed claimants receiving different types of social security benefits are available on a different basis, that is, for individual unemployment benefit offices whose boundaries are not conterminous with local authority boundaries.

The answer given to the hon. Member on 15 May was therefore based on figures for unemployment benefit offices within the Liverpool area. However, in checking these figures it has been discovered that four ofices were mistakenly omitted from them. I am grateful to the hon. Member for pointing out this discrepancy and express my apologies to him for the error.

The corrected figures are as follows:

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the cost of extending the payment of unemployment benefit for a further (i) one year, (ii) two years, (iii) three years and (iv) as long as unemployment lasted; and what would be the cost if the single person's rate of unemployment benefit were increased by £7·35.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1986, c. 419]: The available information is given in the table. The figures are based on unemployment assumptions underlying the report by the Government Actuary on the draft of the Social Security Benefits Uprating Order 1986 (Cmnd. 9789). They are gross costs and do not include savings in supplementary benefit and housing benefit, figures for which are not available.

Psoriasis

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to put psoriasis on the prescribed list of prescription exemptions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 21 July 1986, c. 98]: No. The medical exempt list was established when prescription charges were reintroduced in 1968. It has been reviewed on a number of occasions, most recently in January. On each occasion it was concluded that the existing exemption arrangements should remain unchanged.

Personal Social Services

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set out the total gross expenditure, current and capital, on personal social services, deflated by gross domestic product, retail prices index and the index of social services pay and prices for each year since 1970.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 21 July 1986, c. 104]: Personal social services pay and prices indices on the same basis as post-1973 figures are not readily available for earlier years. Cash and deflated expenditure figures are therefore shown only for years where all three deflator figures can be applied.

Information is as follows:

NATIONAL FINANCE

Customs and Excise

Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many persons are employed in Her Majesty's Customs and Excise service; and what were the comparable figures in 1981, 1976 and 1971.

Mr. Brooke: At 31 March 1986, 25,395 persons were employed in Her Majesty's Customs and Excise; comparable figures were 26,861 at 31 March 1981, 29,551 at 31 March 1976 and 17,949 at 31 March 1971.

Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the cost of administration of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise service in the last 12-month period for which figures are available; and what was the comparable figures for 1981, 1976 and 1971.

Mr. Brooke: The cost of administration of Her Majesty's Custom and Excise in 1985-86 is estimated to have been £411,800,000; comparable figures are £299,683,000 for 1980-81, £174,140,000 for 1975-76, and £45,082,000 for 1970-71.

Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what codes of practice exist for the guidance of Customs and Excise officers in the pursuit of their duties; whether any further codes are planned; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: Customs and Excise issues the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 codes of practice to those staff requiring them in the course of their duties. Codes of practice as such are not otherwise issued to its staff. However, there is a wide range of books of instructions which are updated regularly. These instructions give guidance on the law, the technical aspects of the department's work, and the way officers are to carry out their duties.

Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer who is responsible for overseeing the procedure and work of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise in the execution of its duties; what disciplinary proceedings are available in the event of abuse of these powers by officers; if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The responsibility for the general procedures and work of the Customs and Excise lies with the Board of Customs and Excise. Day-to-day control of Customs and Excise officers in local stations is exercised through 21 regional controllers, called collectors, who are responsible to the board.

Any misuse of authority by an officer will be investigated by the Department within the Civil Service disciplinary procedures. These provide for formal charges to be raised and for penalties to be awarded, in varying degrees of severity according to the gravity of the case, if the charge is proved.

Portsmouth Ferry Terminal

Mr. Hancock asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the number of customs officials that have been employed in each year since Portsmouth ferry terminal opened.

Mr. Brooke: For operational reasons it is not policy to disclose the number of Customs staff employed at specific locations but since the Portsmouth ferry terminal opened there have been a number of increases in the staff employed on customs work.

From time to time use is also made of mobile and specialist staff who are organised on a regional basis and these units have also been considerably strengthened.

Taxation

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the yield of income tax, corporation tax and value added tax in the current financial year; and what is the estimated amount of value-added tax which will be payable to the European Economic Community, including the amounts agreed under supplementary European Economic Community budgets.

Mr. Brooke: The information on estimated tax yields for 1986-87 is as follows. A revised estimate of our net payments to Community institutions for this financial year will be contained in the Autumn Statement, and an estimate of our net contribution to the Community budget in this calendar year will be contained in the White Paper on the 1986 budget, to be published in August or September. The amount of VAT contribution to the 1986 Community budget will be 2,240 mecu (£1,390 million at a budget exchange rate of £1 = 1·6096 ecu). This is net of an abatement of 1,900 mecu (£1,180 million). The Community budget for 1987 has not yet been established.

	Estimated yield 1986-87 £ million
Income Tax	38,500
Corporation Tax	11,700
Value Added Tax	20,700

Source: Table 6.B.3 of Financial Statement and Budget Report 1986-87.

Hospital Radio Organisations

Mr. Amess asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why hospital radio organisations do not receive the same value added tax relief as talking newspapers for the blind.

Mr. Brooke: The relief for talking newspapers for the blind is in line with the Government's policy of providing specific VAT reliefs for the handicapped. The services provided by hospital radio organisations, although making a valuable contribution to the welfare of patients, are significantly different.

Income Tax

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will bring up to date for the current financial year the information given in the reply to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby on 22 March 1984, Official Report, columns 528-29, concerning the proportion of tax paid at specified levels of income.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Figures for 1978-79 and 1986-87 are in the table.

Percentage of gross earnings taken in direct and indirect taxes

		1978-79	1986-87
Three times average earnings	(a) Direct	34·8	33·7
Average earnings	(a) Direct	20·9	21·8
	(b) Indirect	11·3	13·0
60 per cent. of average earnings	(a) Direct	8·4	10·9
45 per cent. of average earnings	(a) Direct	−0·8	1·9

Notes:

1. Average earnings are taken to be the average gross weekly earnings of all full-time males on adult rates with pay unaffected by absence. The figure for 1986-87 is illustrative and assumes growth of 7 per cent. over the provisional 1985-86 outturn.

2. Direct taxes include national insurance contributions and are net of child benefit.

3. The estimates of indirect taxes are based on the 1984 family expenditure survey and exclude rates. Estimates cannot reliably be made outside the range 75 to 150 per cent. of average earnings.

Advance Petroleum Revenue Tax

Mr. Kennedy asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list in the Official Report oilfields in respect of which advance petroleum revenue taxation is currently paid.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I cannot comment on the tax position of individual taxpayers.

Mr. Kennedy asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received concerning possible early repayment of advance petroleum revenue tax; if he will assess the cost of any such proposal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Seven letters have been received, putting forward various different proposals for the early repayment of APRT. The cost would vary depending on the precise proposal made, but the first year cost would be substantial. A case has not yet been made out for a tax change, but I understand that further representations are being made.

EC Budget

Mr. Leighton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, pursuant to his statement of 11 July on the exceeding of the budgetary discipline guidelines in the budget in the European Economic Community, he will set out the guideline figures, the calculations used to produce it and the multiple by which it has been exceeded.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 15 July 1986, c. 499-500]: Further to my statement on 11 July reporting the adoption of a Community budget for 1986, at columns 613-14, the adopted 1986 Community budget provides for EAGGF—guarantee section expenditure of 22,112 mecu (including 567 mecu for expenditure in Spain and Portugal). This represents an increase of 926 mecu or 4·4 per cent. above the financial guidelines for agricultural spending in 1986. The calculations of the 1986 guidelines for the Community of Ten (20,619 mecu) were set out in the document "Key Figures for the 1986 Preliminary Draft Budget" which was laid before the House on 25 June 1985.

The ECOFIN Council on 7 July (reported at column 195), agreed that the provision for agricultural spending in 1986 could be increased by the "amounts which can be justified mainly by the exceptional circumstance of the abnormally large depreciation of the dollar".

Pensions

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update his answer of 19 October 1982, Official Report, columns 82-87, relating to public sector pensions, to the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 21 July 1986, c. 68]: The corresponding information relating to the main public service schemes, based on the most recent information available for the year 1985-86, is shown in the tables. The information on nationalised industries and other public sector employers required to update the final table of the original answer is not readily available. I shall write to the hon. Member in due course.

Notes:

a. Most of the schemes covered by this table provide for pension to accrue at a rate of 1/80 final salary, plus a lump sum of 3/80 final salary, per year of service, up to a maximum of 40 years at age 60 or 65. However, the arrangements for the police and fire services, the armed forces, prison officers (within the Civil Service scheme) and mental health officers (within the NHS scheme) provide for pensions to be paid from earlier ages, with faster accrual rates. The value of such arrangements as a percentage of salary is considerably greater, and is reflected in higher effective employee contributions for the armed forces, the police and the fire service.

b. Civil Service and armed forces pensions are largely non-contributory (the 1½ per cent. contribution paid by male civil servants is for widows' benefits). In the case of the armed forces, a reduction of 11 per cent. was incorporated in pay rates recommended for 1985-86 by the Review Body on Armed Forces Pay, to take account of pension benefits. For the Civil Service no formal reduction has been made to pay rates since the abolition of pay research, but, as with other public services, the value of the pension scheme is a relevant factor in determining an overall remuneration package appropriate to recruit, retain and motivate the necessary staff.

c. The employer contributions listed are those payable to actual or notional pension funds; for the wholly unfunded schemes, no employer contributions as such are paid. However, the NHS and teachers' notional funds and the local authority pension funds (and, therefore, the contributions shown for these schemes) cover basic pensions only, without index-linked increases under the Pensions (Increase) Act 1971: these increases are financed separately by the bodies listed in the final column of the table. The Government Actuary estimates that if these increases were taken into account in the funds the employers' contributions might be higher by some 6 per cent. of pay.

d. Pensions under the local government superannuation scheme are paid from pension funds maintained by county councils, the Common Council of the City of London, London boroughs, certain residuary bodies and district councils in the metropolitan areas and Scottish regional authorities. The employers' contributions vary from fund to fund, and in 1985-86 averaged 5 per cent. in England and Wales (following reductions resulting from recent actuarial valuations) and about 8·5 per cent. in Scotland, where similar reductions are likely to follow later valuations, with effect from April 1986.

DEFENCE

Overseas Personnel

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list in the Official Report the countries in which (1) Her Majesty's forces and (2) civilian personnel are based at the latest date and the number concerned.

Mr. Freeman: The deployment of United Kingdom Service and civilian personnel overseas is contained in table 4.14 of Volume II of the "Statement on Defence Estimates 1986" (Cmnd. 9763-II). The figures for 1 April 1986 are as follows:

DEFENCE

"Low-level Flying"

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make available in all post offices in those areas where low flying is prevalant copies of his Department's publication "Low-level Flying" in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Freeman: We do not have sufficient resources to make copies of the publication available to all post offices in those areas in which military low flying training takes place.

Chemical Weapons and Plutonium

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has on (a) chemical weapons stocks and (b) un-safeguarded plutonium for military use held by the Soviet Union.

Mr. Stanley: On chemical weapons stocks, I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) on 9 May at column 271. On unsafeguarded plutonium, the information is classified.

Weapons Statistics

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has on (a) chemical weapons, (b) biological weapons, (c) nerve gas and (d) unsafeguarded military plutonium stocks held by the United States of America.

Mr. Stanley: The report of the United States Chemical Warfare Review Commission and the annual report by the United States Secretary of Defence for the fiscal year 1987, copies of which are in the Library of the House, indicate that the United States has a limited retaliatory stockpile of chemical weapons, which includes nerve agents. As a party to the 1972 biological weapons convention the United States has renounced the possession of biological weapons. My Department has no details of the United States' stockpile of unsafeguarded military plutonium. Particulars of United States' capabilities are, in any case, a matter for that Government.

Veterinary Corps Dog School, Melton Mowbray.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the estimated cost to public funds of the proposed transfer of the Royal Army Veterinary Corps, Melton Mowbray, dog school to Royal Air Force, Newton.

Mr. Freeman: The proposed move of the Army dog training school from Melton Mowbray to RAF Newton is designed to achieve a saving to the defence budget through the rationalisation of dog training in the Services. There will therefore be no net additional cost to public funds.

Dogs (Veterinary Care)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will set out in tabular form the comparable costs per animal of veterinary care of dogs in (a) the Army and (b) the Royal Air Force.

Mr. Freeman: As I indicated to my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton in answer to his question of 3 July, at column 645, a study has been completed into the establishment of a joint Service dog school at RAF Newton. The study team's report included estimates of costs for veterinary care of dogs in the Army and RAF in the United Kingdom. These figures are being validated by the Services together with the other information contained in the report. It would therefore be premature for me to release this type of detailed information at the present time. I will write to my hon. Friend when the report is finalised.

El Salvador

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence what plans there are to train officers of the El Salvador army in Britain.

Mr. Freeman: I have nothing to add to the answer which my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs gave to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on 19 May 1986 at column 19.

Land Purchases (County Derry)

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Defence what lands his Department or agents acting on its behalf have bought over the last 18 months in the Magilligan area of County Derry; and for what purposes.

Mr. Freeman: The Ministry of Defence has purchased two pieces of land at Magilligan ranges in the past 18 months. This land was originally leased and comprises part of the range area. It was purchased in order to provide security of tenure.

Written Answers to Questions

Thursday 24 July 1986

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Office, Secretarial and Research Allowance

Mr. Harris asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will make a further statement about the office, secretarial and research allowance.

Mr. Biffen: I have already told the House that the resolution agreed on 16 July 1986 will be put into effect. Although its terms apply to the rate for 1985-86, as well as that for 1986-87, it would clearly not be appropriate for retrospective claims to be paid by the Fees Office. The resolution will therefore apply only to the rate of the allowance for 1986-87.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Westland plc

Sir Edward Gardner asked the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on those aspects of the fourth report from the Defence Committee on Westland plc., the Government's decision-making, which fall within his responsibilities.

The Attorney-General: The Select Committee state that if, when I authorised an offer of immunity from prosecution to one of the officials concerned in the Head of the Home Civil Service's inquiry into the circumstances of the disclosure of the Solicitor General's letter of 6 January, I was able at that stage to say that under no circumstances would I have prosecuted the official concerned, I must have known, and must have learnt from the head of the Home Civil Service, that the disclosure had been authorised.

I wish to make it absolutely clear that at the time then I advised that an inquiry be instituted I did not know by whom the disclosure had been made or that it had been authorised by the then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry or at all.

At the time when I granted immunity to the official concerned, while I had reason to believe that the disclosure had been made by the official concerned and that the official concerned had acted in complete good faith, I was not aware of the full circumstances. It was important that the inquiry should discover as fully as possible the circumstances in which the disclosure came to be made, and should provide those concerned with the opportunity of giving their accounts of their part in the affair. It was clear that the testimony of the official in question would be vital to the inquiry, and I judged it right that possible impediment to full co-operation in the inquiry should be removed. I was and am satisfied that that in no way interfered with the course of justice: the facts as disclosed in the inquiry confirmed my judgment that there would have been no question of proceeding against the official concerned.

As the Select Committee recognises, I was not told of the direct involvement of the then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry until 22 January.

Race Relations Act 1976

Mr. Knox asked the Attorney-General how many prosecutions have been brought under the Race Relations Act 1976; and how many have been successful.

The Attorney-General: Thirty-five prosecutions have been brought under section 5A of the Public Order Act 1936, inserted by section 70 of the Race Relations Act 1976. In 25 of these cases convictions have been secured.

Mr. Kevin Taylor

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Attorney-General, pursuant to the answer of 26 June, Official Report, column 267, what action the Director of Public Prosecutions has taken on the preliminary report submitted to him on the activities of Mr. Kevin Taylor; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The position remains as stated in my reply to the right hon. Member on 3 July 1986 at column 595. The conduct of the investigation is an operational matter for the Greater Manchester police, who have received the advice referred to in my reply.

Mr. Manus Nunan (Recordership)

Mr. Alton asked the Attorney-General, further to his answer of 14 July, Official Report, column 317, to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) what were the dates of the written advice of both Mr. Justice McPherson, and Mr. Justice Russell, dealing with the non-renewal of the recordership of Mr. Manus Nunan.

The Attorney-General: The presiding judges of the Northern circuit at the relevant time were Mr. Justice McNeill and Mr. Justice Russell. The Lord Chancellor consulted them shortly before, on 4 December 1984, he decided not to renew Mr. Nunan's Recordership. All such consultations are conducted on a basis of complete confidentiality and he cannot give further details.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

National Seed Development Corporation and Plant Breeding Institute

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has reached a decision on the proposed transfer of the National Seed Development Corporation and Plant Breeding Institute to the private sector.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: My predecessor announced on 18 February that he and Agriculture Ministers had decided that a transfer of the National Seed Development Organisation and part of the Plant Breeding Institute to the private sector would be desirable provided it can be achieved on satisfactory terms. We have now received, and studied, a report by Lazard Brothers and Company Ltd. The Government are satisfied that transferring NSDO and the applied plant breeding departments at PBI to the private sector is the best way of ensuring that their experience and expertise is applied and developed to the fullest extent and to the maximum benefit of United Kingdom agriculture and the United Kingdom economy.

In consequence, the intention is to offer the NSDO and the PBI applied breeding departments, with certain scientific and support elements, for sale later this year. The strategic plant science departments at the PBI will remain in the public sector and become part of the Agricultural and Food Research Council's new Institute of Plant Science Research. This science will continue to underpin plant breeding in both the public and private sectors.

I recognise and commend the vital contribution of NSDO and PBI staff to present and past successes. I believe that all of the staff concerned will respond well to the new opportunities for continuing success to the benefit of the United Kingdom created by this sale and the parellel creation of the new institute.

Interested purchasers will be asked to give a full statement of their future intentions for the assets in relation to United Kingdom needs and capabilities for plant breeding and seed marketing, and to benefits to the United Kingdom economy. A decision to proceed with the sale will be subject to obtaining satisfactory terms, particularly with regard to the needs of United Kingdom agriculture and horticulture.

We will shortly be appointing financial advisers to assist with the proposed sale.

Expenditure

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list in the Official Report the planned level of spending per pupil in schools as provided for by the Government's annual expenditure plans White Paper, since 1979, at cash and cost prices; and if he will provide figures for actual spending per pupil for those same years.

Mr. Dunn: The available information is as follows. For the years 1979-80 to 1981-82 inclusive it includes an element of estimation because the Government's plans were then drawn in constant prices rather than cash.

Net Institutional Expenditure per Pupil[1]

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list in the Official Report the levels of direct and indirect spending at outturn and at 1985-86 prices and indexed on (a) public sector schools, (b) voluntary schools and (c) independent schools, by central Government and by local government in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Chris Patten: The table sets out expenditure by the Department of Education and Science and by local education authorities in England for the years 1978-79 to 1985-86. Information for earlier years is not readily available on the same basis. Local education authority expenditure returns to the Department do not distinguish between voluntary and other maintained schools: the figures in the table for the maintained sector include voluntary schools.

Pupil-Teacher Ratios

Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the pupil-teacher ratios for (a) maintained primary schools, (b) maintained secondary schools and (c) the overall ratio for maintained schools, in (i) Hertfordshire and (ii) nationally for the years 1970 to 1985 respectively.

Mr. Dunn: Information for Hertfordshire for years before 1975 is not readily available. The pupil-teacher ratios for maintained primary schools, maintained secondary schools and overall for the years 1975 to 1985 for Hertfordshire and England are as follows:

	Pupil-teacher ratio

*A small number of student teachers and instructors are not included in the calculation.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give for 1979, 1983 and 1986 the pupil-teacher ratio in maintained primary and secondary schools and overall and the percentage changes since 1979 in each case, and the percentage of classes with over 30 pupils in maintained primary and secondary schools.

Mr. Dunn: The pupil-teacher ratio in maintained primary, middle and secondary schools and overall and the percentage of classes with over 30 pupils for 1979, 1983 and 1986 for England are as follows:

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a table to show for 1979, 1983 and 1986 in (a) England and (b) Leicester, the number of pupils and of teachers in maintained schools and the percentage fall since 1979 in each case.

Mr. Dunn: The number of pupils and teachers in maintained primary, middle and secondary schools in England and Leicestershire for the years 1979, 1983 and 1986 are as follows:

School Curriculum

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he makes any distinction between subjects which are essential elements in the school curriculum and those which are part of the core curriculum; why he uses these two descriptions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: My right hon. Friend's policies for the curriculum remain those set out in "Better Schools" (Cmnd. 9469) in which the description "core curriculum" is not used. The Government believe that certain subjects have a place in the curriculum of all pupils up to age 16; these were set out in answer to the hon. Member's question of 3 July, at columns 149-50. There are other elements of the school curriculum which we believe should form part of the education of all pupils, but which need not necessarily be studied at all ages and stages, or as separate subjects.

First Degree Students

Mr. Ron Davies: asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has about the number of first degree students enrolling in the current academic year at universities.

Mr. Walden: Final information for 1985 is not yet available. Provisional information, based on the number of accepted home candidates through the Universities' Central Council on Admissions, suggests there were 71,000 full-time and sandwich home new entrant undergraduates to universities in Great Britain in 1985.

Students (Languages)

Mr. Viggers asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many students have qualified at ordinary level, advanced level and at degree standard in each of the following languages in each of the last five years (a) French, (b) German, (c) Spanish, (d) Russian and (e) Chinese.

Mr. Walden: Numbers of public sector students graduating in individual languages are not available. The available figures of students qualifying at each level are given in the following tables.

School Textbooks

Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has about the level of expenditure on school textbooks by local education authorities in England and Wales.

Mr. Chris Patten: In 1984-85, the latest year for which firm information on spending is available, LEAs in England spent £63 million on all books in primary and secondary schools. Information on spending in Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish the number of pupils on the assisted places scheme (a) in sixth forms and (b) not in sixth forms in each of the past five years.

Mr. Dunn: The information requested is as follows:

	Number of assisted places taken u
	VIth Form	11+ or 13+
1981-82	525	3,660
1982-83	1,139	7,477

Higher Education

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will provide the figures for the amount of money in cash and constant values paid by Her Majesty's Government and the local education authorities per head of the student population to public sector higher education in England and Wales in the financial year 1979-80 and in the present financial year.

Mr. Walden: The information requested for 1979-80 and for 1984-85, the latest period for which actual data are available, is given in the following table.

Information on spending for Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and is not held by my Department.

Students (Funding)

Dr. Hampson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has about the recent change in the formula for funding of part-time students (a) at Birkbeck college and (b) generally; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: The University Grants Committee has decided that in future it will allocate resources such that over the whole period of their courses part-time students are funded at the same level as full-time students on equivalent courses. The committee has also decided that for 1986-87 it will increase its previously announced block grant to the University of London by £600,000 so that the amount allowed in respect of students at Birkbeck college is calculated on the same basis as in recent years.

Natural Environment Research Council

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether, pursuant to the letter to the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden) dated 10 April, he is now in a position to give further details of his discussions and correspondence with the chairman of the Natural Environment Research Council regarding the British Nationality Act 1981.

Mr. Walden: I wrote to the chairman of the Natural Environment Research Council on 10 March agreeing with him that we must try to resolve the outstanding problems regarding designation under section 2(3) of the British Nationality Act 1981. My officials have had discussions with officers in the Natural Environment Research Council and the other research councils concerned. Consultations with officers in the Home Office are continuing on how best to reach a solution.

Schools (Collective Worship)

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) when schools in Norfolk were last monitored by Her Majesty's Inspectorate in order to establish that the legal requirement for a daily act of collective worship was being observed;

(2) when schools in Newcastle-upon-Tyne were last monitored by Her Majesty's Inspectorate in order to establish that the legal requirement for a daily act of collective worship was being observed;

(3) when schools in Avon were last monitored by Her Majesty's Inspectorate in order to establish that the legal requirement for a daily act of collective worship was being observed;

(4) when schools in the Inner London education authority were last monitored by Her Majesty's Inspectorate in order to establish that the legal requirement for a daily act of collective worship was being observed;

(5) when schools in Liverpool were last monitored by Her Majesty's Inspectorate in order to establish that the legal requirement for a daily act of collective worship was being observed;

(6) when schools in Birmingham were last monitored by Her Majesty's Inspectorate in order to establish that the legal requirement for a daily act of collective worship was being observed;

(7) when schools in Manchester were last monitored by Her Majesty's Inspectorate in order to establish that the legal requirement for a daily act of collective worship was being observed;

(8) when schools in Leeds were last monitored by Her Majesty's Inspectorate in order to establish that the legal requirement for a daily act of collective worship was being observed;

(9) when schools in North Yorkshire were last monitored by Her Majesty's Inspectorate in order to establish that the legal requirement for a daily act of collective worship was being observed;

(10) when schools in Bradford were last monitored by Her Majesty's Inspectorate in order to establish that the legal requirement for a daily act of collective worship was being observed;

(11) when schools in Sheffield were last monitored by Her Majesty's Inspectorate in order to establish that the legal requirement for a daily act of collective worship was being observed.

Mr. Chris Patten: The role of Her Majesty's Inspectorate is to report to my right hon. Friend, from evidence gained by inspection, on the strengths and weaknesses of education nationally. It is not its function when inspecting maintained schools to check whether particular statutory requirements, such as those for collective worship, are being observed: but if it had reason to believe that a school was evading such a requirement, it would raise the matter with the head teacher or the local education authority concerned and would, if necessary, report it to my right hon. Friend.

Mental Health

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his answer of 1 July, Official Report, column 469, when he expects the schizophrenia and allied conditions committee of the Medical Research Council to report on opportunities for future research.

Mr. Walden: The Medical Research Council hopes that the schizophrenia and allied conditions committee will report back to the council's neurosciences board during the next academic year.

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of his Department's grant-in-aid to the Medical Research Council is spent on (a) mental health in general and (b) schizophrenia in particular; what are the relevant sums in the current year.

Mr. Walden: It is for the Medical Research Council to determine its priorities from within the annual grant-in-aid which it receives from the Department's science budget. I understand that in the financial year 1985-86 the MRC spent from its budget £9·1 million on research exclusively on mental health (including addiction) which accounts for 8 per cent. of the council's budget. Out of its expenditure on mental health research the council spent £525,000 on research exclusively on schizophrenia, which accounts for 0·5 per cent. of the council's budget. I understand that the MRC is also funding other work in which mental health and schizophrenia are minor components.

Spina Bifida

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received concerning the Medical Research Council tests involving vitamin supplementation of mothers at risk of having spina bifida children.

Mr. Walden: Since January 1986 I have received one letter. My right hon. Friend has received none.

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what government funds are being used through the Medical Research Council to finance its project involving vitamin supplementation of mothers at risk of having spina bifida children.

Mr. Walden: I understand that the estimated cost of the trial is £600,000.

Women (Neural Tube Defect)

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what assessment he makes of the statistical significance of the difference in recurrence rates of neural tube defect between supplemented and unsupplemented mothers was due to vitamin supplementation.

Mr. Walden: I understand that the difference in the recurrence rates of neural tube defects between supplemented and unsupplemented mothers was statistically significant, that it to say, it was unlikely to have been chance alone. However, while the statistical significance of the results is not in question the medical significance is. There are two possible explanations for the difference, namely, that the vitamins reduced the risk of neural tube defects or that the women who took supplements were in any case at a very low risk of having neural tube defect pregnancies and therefore were not comparable with the women who did not.

The Medical Research Council and its advisers believe that, on present evidence, it is not possible to judge which of these explanations is the right one and that the way to find out is to conduct a properly controlled clinical trial. The trial is therefore proceeding, although it is too soon to draw any conclusions.

Marine Science and Technology

Mr. Forman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when the Government propose to respond to the House of Lords Select Committee on Science and Technology's report on marine science and technology; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have written today to the Chairman of the Committee's Sub-committee II with the Government's response, which has been published as a White Paper (Cmnd. 9861).

The Government welcome the Committee's report and accept that a mechanism for greater co-ordination across the breadth of marine science and technology is required. I have agreed therefore to sponsor the establishment of a co-ordinating committee on marine science and techno logy. I expect to announce the terms of reference and composition of the CCMST in the autumn.

Building Projects (Performance Data)

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress has been made by his Department with regard to the collection and publication of comparative performance data on building projects undertaken by local education authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: It is important that when LEAs undertake educational building projects they should achieve value for money as well as fitness for purpose. My Department will shortly begin to collect data on individual major building projects on a basis agreed with the local authority associations. The collected data will be published. I hope that this will assist LEAs in their search for value for money by providing benchmarks by which each authority can judge its performance against experience elsewhere.

THE ARTS

Property Services Agency

Mr. Jessel asked the Minister for the Arts what progress has been made in his review of the relationship between the Property Services Agency and the major arts institutions for which he is responsible.

Mr. Luce: In its eighth report (Session 1981-82) the Education, Science and Arts Committee recommended that the Minister for the Arts should review the relationship between the Property Services Agency and the major arts institutions for which it had responsibilities. The Government accepted that such a review would be useful (Cmnd. 9127). The review is now complete. It has been carried out by my officials in close consultation with the PSA and the institutions sponsored by my Department: namely, most of the national museums and galleries in England and the British Library.

At present, the PSA carries out the building and maintenance work at the national museums and galleries and the British Library's Crown property. The Office of Arts and Libraries allocates a block of funds for these services from its public expenditure programme. Within the funds available, the composition of the works programme each year is decided by OAL and the PSA in consultation with the institutions about their requirements and priorities.

The present arrangements partly reflect the origins of some of the institutions within Government Departments. But, following the Heritage Act 1983, all of them now have independent trustee status. It is anomalous that these indenpendent trustee bodies should have building works and services, which are of central importance to the functioning of the institution, excluded from their responsibilities and in the hands of a central Government agency. The review has concluded that such a division of responsibilities is not conducive to the most effective discharge of the trustees' role in determining their own priorities and allocation of resources, and achieving the best value for the money available to them. In the view of the Government, and of all the institutions concerned, it would be better to concentrate responsibility for all the costs of running the museums and galleries, including building and works services, in the hands of the trustees.

I have therefore concluded, with the agreement of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, that the institutions should not remain tied to the PSA for their works services. Instead, the Office of Arts and Libraries will allocate directly an annual grant-in-aid to each institution for building and maintenance work. The trustees will be responsible for its use, according to their priorities, and for achieving the best value for money. Major projects will continue to be subject to OAL approval.

In announcing this decision, my right hon. Friend and I wish to pay a warm tribute to the staff of PSA and its predecessors who have looked after these buildings over the years. The Museums and Galleries Group has justifiably earned an international reputation in this specialised field. But in the circumstances which now apply, the trustees of all the institutions concerned support this change. It is a major change which will require careful planning and management during the transitional period. Each institution will need to develop its own arrangements for discharging these substantial new responsibilities, and this will take time. My intention is that the institutions should assume their new responsibilities during the course of the financial year 1988-89.

The report recognises that the proposals may have implications for those museums and galleries which are not sponsored by my Department. It will be for the other sponsoring Departments to consider with the institutions and with PSA whether any changes in their arrangements should be made.

I have placed in the Library today a memorandum on the change, together with the review report.

CIVIL SERVICE

"Civil Servants and Ministers: Duties and Responsibilities"

Mr. Cash asked the Minister for the Civil Service when the Government expect to reply to the seventh report of the Treasury Civil Service Committee, "Civil Servants and Ministers: Duties and Responsibilities".

Mr. Luce: The Government's response to the Treasury and Civil Service Committee's report is published today as a Command Paper (Cmnd. 9841). Copies of the response have been placed in the Library.

Ethnic Monitory

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Minister for the Civil Service if he will ensure that monitoring of ethnic background of members of the Civil Service is not traceable back to the individuals concerned.

Mr. Luce: Effective safeguards have been agreed with the Council of Civil Service Unions to ensure the confidentiality of ethnic data and that it is used only to further the Civil Service's policy of equal opportunity. Ethnic monitoring will involve the use of statistical summaries of ethnic information of how people progress at recruitment and promotion but the identities of respondents will not appear.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Departmental Cash Limits

Mr. Powley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if any changes will be made to the cash limits on his Department's Votes for 1986-87; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The cash limit on class II, vote 6 relating to expenditure by the Overseas Development Administration on overseas aid administration will be reduced by £161,000 from £27,262,000 to £27,101,000. This is to compensate for over-expenditure of £161,000 in 1985-86 and follows the standard practice whereby an excess over the cash limit in one year is deducted from the cash limit in the next year. The excess occurred because departmental running costs, mainly on pay and agency payments, were greater than expected on the basis of previous expenditure patterns at the end of the year. The Administration has reviewed its monitoring and control procedures in order to improve its cash limits control.

Gibraltar Shiprepair Ltd.

Mr. Powley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much remains to be spent from the Government's aid allocations for Gibraltar Shiprepair Ltd.; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: A total of £3,685,000 remains to be spent from the £28 million aid grant agreed between the Government and the Government of Gibraltar in July 1983 and from the £2·4 million additional grant which the Government offered this year as its final contribution to the conversion of Gibraltar's naval dockyard into a commercial company, Gibraltar Shiprepair Ltd., owned by the Gibraltar Government.

PRIME MINISTER

Small Firms

Q40. Mr. MacKenzie asked the Prime Minister if she will transfer all responsibility for Government policy towards small firms to the Department of Trade and Industry; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Small firms make an essential contribution to the Department of Employment's objective of promoting enterprise and job creation. I have no plans to transfer responsibility for this important aspect of the Government's policies from the Department of Employment.

La Belle Discotheque (Bombing)

Q99. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister pursuant to her answer of 19 June, Official Report, column 617, what criteria Her Majesty's Government used in determining the veracity of all the firm evidence and of the non-firm evidence relating to the alleged involvement of Libya and other countries in the La Belle discotheque bombing on 5 April in Berlin.

The Prime Minister: It would not be appropriate to discuss the assessment of intelligence material.

King's Newham

Q116. Mr. Pawsey asked the Prime Minister if she has any plans to make an official visit to King's Newham, near Rugby.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Customs (Prosecutions)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Prime Minister if she will consider transferring the responsibility for prosecuting under customs legislation from Her Majesty's Customs and Excise to the Director of Public Prosecutions.

The Prime Minister: No. The Royal Commission on criminal procedure considered this possibility but rejected it. The committee on the enforcement powers of the Revenue departments came to the same conclusion.

Engagements

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 24 July.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 24 July.

Mr. Amess asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 24 July.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 24 July.

Mr. Hirst asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 24 July.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Dr. Kurt Waldheim

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Prime Minister if she will make a further statement on progress being made with the investigation of Ministry of Defence records regarding the alleged involvement of Dr. Kurt Waldheim of German Army Group E in the interrogation and subsequent deaths of British prisoners of war during world war 2.

The Prime Minister: The Ministry of Defence search of records for information relevant in the context of the disappearance of British service men in the Balkans during the war is still continuing.

South Africa

Mr. Wareing asked the Prime Minister what advice she has received from the British Industry Committee on South Africa on Her Majesty's Government's trade and investment policy towards South Africa; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have not received any advice directly from the British Industry Committee on South Africa, but I understand that, in its regular contacts with Ministers and officials, it has continued to maintain its opposition to punitive economic sanctions against South Africa.

Inner Cities

Mr. Wareing asked the Prime Minister if she will now place in the Library (a) the report of the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), the then Secretary of State for the Environment, about the Toxteth riots, entitled "It took a Riot", (b) the letter of the right hon. and learned Member for Surrey, East, (Sir G. Howe) then Chancellor of the Exchequer, in response to that report and (c) the report of the Central Policy Review Staff on problems of the inner cities; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: No.

Royal Wedding

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Prime Minister what is the total estimated cost to public funds of the royal wedding; and if she will give a detailed breakdown of that total.

The Prime Minister: The estimated costs to the Exchequer are:

Department of the Environment
Provision of flags, removal of traffic bollards, security checks and provision of temporary lavatories for the public.	40,000
Ministry of Defence
Provision of security and ceremonial services.	12,000
Metropolitan Police
The additional cost of policing. Other additional costs of catering, transport and barriers are not yet quantifiable.	61,000

SCOTLAND

Scottish Health Education Group

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any proposals to privatise the functions of the Scottish Health Education Group.

Mr. John MacKay: No.

Spittal Quarry, Caithness

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has received an appeal from Caithness district council against the refusal by Highland regional council of the planning application to establish a refuse dump at Spittal Quarry, Caithness.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. and learned Friend has received no such appeal.

Lorimer and Clark's Brewery (Closure)

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received about the closure of Lorimer and Clark's Brewery in Edinburgh; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. and learned Friend has received no representations. I very much regret the decision to close the Lorimer and Clark Brewery in Edinburgh. However, the decision of closure was taken on commercial grounds and is a matter for the judgment of Vaux plc of Sunderland.

Chernobyl Disaster (Food Imports)

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from Edinburgh district council about imported food precautions following the Chernobyl accident; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. and learned Friend has received one letter from Edinburgh district council requesting information about imported food precautions and other matters related to the Chernobyl accident. A reply will be sent shortly.

Hypothermia

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the number of deaths registered in Scotland caused by hypothermia for the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:

Tourism

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he has taken, or envisages, to develop a regional strategy for tourist developments, especially in remote and peripheral areas.

Mr. John MacKay: The development of a regional strategy for assistance to tourism projects lies principally with the appropriate Government agencies. The Highlands and Islands Development Board already has an area development strategy under which projects from the more fragile and remote parts of the board's area are given priority. One of the priorities of the Scottish Tourist Board's financial assistance scheme is to improve facilities, especially accommodation, in rural areas outwith the Highlands and Islands. With the Government's encouragement, the Scottish Tourist Board has commenced a programme of feasibility studies which, inter alia, will result in the clearer definition of regional priorities for the board's development funds. The area tourist board network has an important role to play in helping the two boards identify the needs of the industry at the local level and ensuring that assistance is targeted effectively.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he has taken to encourage the growth of the United Kingdom market for the Scottish tourist industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: In terms of visitor numbers, the United Kingdom market represents about 90 per cent. of the Scottish tourist trade. With the Government's full support, both the Scottish Tourist Board and the Highlands and Islands Development Board concentrate their marketing effort on the domestic market. A number of new initiatives have been taken by the two bodies, including advertising campaigns on the London underground by the Highlands and Islands Development Board and the Scottish Tourist Board's campaign "Surprising Scotland", both designed to attract residents in England who have never spent a holiday in Scotland.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what advice his Department has given to local authorities and the tourist industry concerning investment and development opportunities and the demand for associated infra-structure projects.

Mr. John MacKay: Direct responsibility for the provision of advice on and financial assistance for development opportunities in the tourist industry lies primarily with the Scottish Tourist Board and the Highlands and Islands Development Board. Both bodies are in close contact with the relevant interests and operate well-publicised financial assistance schemes to support tourism projects. Overlap between the bodies is avoided by a long-standing agreement that developers seeking assistance in the highlands and islands should approach HIDB in the first instance and that STB should confine its assistance for the most part to developments outwith the highlands and islands. These arrangements do not preclude joint collaboration by the boards in appropriate cases.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what fluctuations have taken place in the annual number of foreign visitors to Scotland over the past four years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The numbers of trips made by overseas visitors to Scotland in the past four years are as follows:

	Number
1982	972,000
1983	1,062,000
1984	1,142,000
*1985	1,211,000

* Provisional.

The figures show a substantial and continuing increase throughout the period.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps his Department is taking to improve the status of tourist-related work and occupations.

Mr. John MacKay: The onus is on the industry to improve its own image and to emphasise the all-important role the employee plays in producing a service of quality. The Government fully recognise the importance of the industry to the economy as a whole and, in doing so, have identified a wide range of measures that need to be taken in order to ensure tourism's further expansion and continued success. As evidence of this, I refer the hon. Member to the report published last year, 'Pleasure, Leisure and Jobs — the Business of Tourism', The recently published follow-up to that report "Action for jobs in Tourism" and the Government's response to the Trade and Industry Committee's report "Tourism in the United Kingdom".

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he proposes to take to develop training courses for tourist businesses and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: Much has been and is being done to develop training courses for prospective and current employees in the industry. There is, for instance, currently available a wide range of further education courses relevant to the needs of all groups of employees in the tourism and related industries such as hotel and catering. The range of courses is kept continually under review in light of assessments of requirements of particular industries and the uptake by industry of the courses available. In the higher education sector, a number of central institutions are active in providing catering and institutional management courses, business courses and other relevant education. These, two, are kept under review. The industry itself has a crucial role to play in the further development of training. The Scottish Tourist Board, as the Government's statutory adviser on tourism and main link with the industry, has been asked to consider what needs to be done in order to improve the industry's awareness of existing training courses and to identify any gaps in current provision.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what guidance his Department has given to local authorities concerning services to tourists and the development of infrastructural support from tourist businesses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The general importance attached by the Government to the future development of the tourist industry has been clearly confirmed in the report "Pleasure, Leisure and Jobs—The Business of Tourism" and its recent follow-up "Action for Jobs in Tourism". A copy of these reports has been sent to all Scottish local authorities. Local authorities are, therefore, well aware of the Government's intentions for this sector of the economy. The provision of services and the development of infrastructural support are, however, matters for local authorities to determine themselves in the light of local needs and priorities. Local authorities can obtain advice and guidance on the development of tourist-related services and infrastructure from the Scottish Tourist Board, the Highlands and Islands Development Board and area tourist boards.

Goods and Services (Contracts)

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has as to the total amount spent in respect of Scottish local authorities on the acquisition of goods and services, expressed in terms of the net contract prices; and how many individual contracts comprised that volume of purchasing for each of the last five years for which figures are available, giving both the overall totals for each Scottish local authority and the totals disaggregated into the following categories: (a) capital and revenue expenditure, (b) construction and non-construction projects, (c) goods and services purchased from United Kingdom-based companies and non-United Kingdom-based companies and (d) goods and services purchased from the private sector and from other parts of the public sector.

Mr. Ancram: This information is not available centrally.

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has in respect of the Scottish Transport Group, the South of Scotland electricity board and the North of Scotland hydro-electric board as to the total amount spent on the acquisition of goods and services, expressed in terms of the net contract prices; and how many individual contracts comprised that volume of purchasing for each of the last five years for which figures are available, giving both the overall totals in each case and the totals disaggregated into the following categories: (a) capital and revenue expenditure, (b) construction and non-construction projects, (c) goods and services purchased from United Kingdom-based companies and non-United Kingdom-based companies and (d) goods and services purchased from the private sector and from other parts of the public sector.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information is not held centrally.

Housing Action Area, Edinburgh

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland why he has taken more than 28 days to approve the Edinburgh Albert Street (No. 3) housing action area for improvements; and when he is likely to communicate his decision on the matter to the City of Edinburgh district council.

Mr. Ancram: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my right hon. and learned Friend gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher) on 21 July at column 30.

Police (Complaints)

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will call for reports from chief constables in Scotland to establish the number of police officers and civil staff engaged full time on the investigation of complaints against the police in 1985, and the cost of such investigations, in a form comparable to the figures quoted on page 85 of the 1985 Report of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

Mr. John MacKay: No police officers or civilian staff were engaged exclusively on the investigation of complaints against the police in Scotland in 1985. However, five of the eight Scottish forces have full-time branches dealing with complaints and disciplinary matters and at 31 December 1985 some 30 police and civilian staff were so engaged. It is not feasible to identify separately the costs of the complaints function of these branches.

Leisure and Recreation (Management Training)

Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to receive the report on management training for leisure and recreation in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: I have now received the report on management training for leisure and recreation in Scotland, which Professor Lewis Gunn has submitted on behalf of the working party of which he has been chairman. It will be published today and I am arranging for copies to be placed in the Library of the House.

I am grateful to the working party for the effort it has put into this study. Most of its principal recommendations are directed towards organisations which provide leisure and recreation services, which I know will find them a valuable source of advice and guidance. I am arranging a wide distribution of the report and will consider carefully its proposals involving action by central Government.

Gaelic Language

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the leaflets and forms which his Department prints in Gaelic or in an English/Gaelic bilingual format.

Mr. Rifkind [pursuant to his reply, 15 July 1986, c. 497]: There are no such forms or leaflets.

EMPLOYMENT

Action for Jobs Campaign

Mr. Caborn asked the Paymaster General how many civil servants are working on the action for jobs campaign.

Mr. Lang: Six officers in the publicity and promotions unit of my department's information branch and two in the manpower policy division have worked on the campaign in addition to their other duties. Since action for jobs concerns the full range of employment, training and enterprise measures, many other officials have been involved at various stages.

Mr. Caborn asked the Paymaster General what consultations took place with the Manpower Services Commission on the action for jobs campaign; and if they have agreed to use it in conjunction with other schemes.

Mr. Lang: Various discussions have taken place between my Department and the Manpower Services Commission about such matters as the drafting of the "Action for Jobs" booklet and the distribution arrangements. The MSC have agreed that in future, publicity for their individual measures will, like that for all my Department's programmes, carry the "Action for Jobs" logo.

Gas and Oil Fields (Workers)

Mr. Prescott asked the Paymaster General if he will give details of workers employed offshore in the United Kingdom sectors of the gas and oil fields showing total numbers employed, the number of United Kingdom nationals and the number of non-United Kingdom nationals, for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Lang: The available estimates are published in paragraph 5.1 and appendix 13 of "Development of the Oil and Gas Resources of the United Kingdom 1986", a copy of which is in the Library.

Community Programme

Mr. Sheerman asked the Paymaster General how much money the Manpower Services Commission has made available in 1985-86 for training on the community programme scheme, over and above that taken from operating costs and wages: and what sums are being made available for training on these programmes in 1986-87 which are over and above those allowed for operating costs and wages.

Mr. Lang: In 1985-86 £3·8 million was made available for training participants on the community programme over and above that available for operating costs and wages. The figure for 1986-87 is £5·7 million.

College of the Air

Mr. Williams asked the Paymaster General if he intends to provide a parallel College of the Air service in Welsh.

Mr. Trippier: The Government's intention is that the College of the Air should provide a service for all parts of the community. The precise means for achieving this, including the scope for Welsh language broadcasts, will be a matter for the College itself to determine, in discussion with broadcasters, education institutions and many others.

I refer the right hon. Member to my right hon. and noble Friend's remarks in another place on 18 July, Official Report columns 1098-99.

Factory Inspectors

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Paymaster General how many factory inspectors with special responsibility for the safety of construction sites have qualifications in building, civil engineering or a similar discipline.

Mr. Trippier: Thirty seven inspectors based in Health and Safety Executive area offices and currently employed on the inspection of construction work hold technical qualifications relating to construction disciplines.

These are supported by 22 specialist construction inspectors, all chartered members of the Institution of Civil Engineers, or the Institution of Structural Engineers, based in HSE headquarters and outstations.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Paymaster General if he has any plans to review the present recruitment procedures of factory inspectors in relation to their selection for work in Health and Safety Executive area offices; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: Factory inspectors are recruited under arrangements made by the Civil Service Commission. The Health and Safety Executive keeps in close touch with the Commission to ensure that these arrangements are meeting their needs.

Departmental Freephone (Cost)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Paymaster General what is the cost of the freephone facility now provided at the small firms centre of his Department; and if he will make a statement on estimated expenditure in future years.

Mr. Trippier: In 1985-86 the cost of the freefone service for the small firms centres in England administered by my Department was £301,000.

In Scotland and Wales the small firms service is provided by the Scottish and Welsh Development Agencies.

In future years the estimated expenditure is not expected to rise in real terms.

Health and Safety Executive

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Paymaster General if he will list in the Official Report the total amount claimed in expenses in the financial year 1985-86, by the director general of the Health and Safety Executive; how many days he spent outside the United Kingdom in his working capacity; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The total amount claimed in expenses by the director general of the Health and Safety Executive during the financial year 1985-86 was £3,792·48. He spent two days at the Marcoule nuclear fuel reprocessing plant.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Paymaster General if he will list in the Official Report the number of officials, by grade, of the Health and Safety Executive who, though formally retired, are still in receipt of an income from the executive for full or part-time services rendered, together with salary involved for each grade; and if he will make a statement on the retirement policies of the Health and Safety Executive.

Mr. Trippier: The details requested are as follows:

1 Grade 5—£7,432
2 Superintending Inspectors of Factories—£22,937
1 Inspector Nuclear Installations—£16,848
1 Senior Executive Officer—£9,884

In addition one official has been engaged as a consultant with fees to a maximum of £5,075 pa. Another has been engaged as a committee chairman with fees of up to £200 pa.

Staff of the Health and Safety Executive in administration grades are subject to the Department of Employment group retirement policy. The executive's retirement policy for grades which it manages directly requires the majority of staff, particularly those in more senior grades, to retire at age 60. Staff in junior grades are required to retire at various ages beyond age 60 depending on their grade and length of service. Normally, no officer is employed beyond age 65.

Industrial Hazards (Control)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Paymaster General how many companies have yet to submit full safety cases under the Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazard Regulations 1984, together with the number which so far have submitted such cases; and if he will make a statement with special reference to the views expressed to his Department by the Chemical Industries Association.

Mr. Trippier: Up to 31 March 1986, 29 companies had submitted safety cases to the Health and Safety Executive for consideration. Another 243 companies are required to submit safety cases by 8 July 1989.

Ministers in the Department have received no recent representations from the Chemical Industries Association on safety cases.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Mr. Willie McCrae

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will cause to be reopened the police investigation into the circumstances surrounding the death of Mr. Willie McCrae; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The police investigation will not be reopened. A full report was received from the procurator fiscal at Inverness concerning his investigation of the circumstances surrounding the death of William McCrae. This report was considered by Crown counsel, who were satisfied that there were no circumstances to warrant criminal proceedings. The results of the procurator fiscal's full investigations were disclosed to Mr. McCrae's brother and discussed with him. He expressed satisfaction with the extent of the investigation and indicated that there was no wish on the part of the family for a public inquiry.

Procurators Fiscal

Dr. Godman asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many procurators fiscal are at present employed; and what is the salary scale for the occupation.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The numbers and salary scales for procurators fiscal are as follows:

	Number	Salary scale £
Regional Procurators Fiscal	2	32,350—35,350
Regional Procurators Fiscal	4	28,350—29,850
Upper level Procurators Fiscal	13	23,730—27,065
Lower level Procurators Fiscal	29	17,586—23,404
In addition there are:
Assistant Procurators Fiscal	11	23,730—27,065
Senior Depute Procurators Fiscal	7	17,586—23,404
Depute Procurators Fiscal	149	8,479—22,575

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Copyright

Mr. Abse asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action the British embassy in Seoul has taken to ensure the protection of British copyright works in South Korea, following discussions on the issue between the Prime Minister and President Chun in May.

Mr. Pattie: The British embassy has continued to press the Korean Government to provide appropriate protection to British copyright works. The Minister for Trade also raised the issue during his recent visit to Seoul.

Mr. Abse asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what assessment he has made of the consequences for British copyright of the proposed bilateral agreement between the Government of South Korea and the United States of America;

(2) what information he has about whether the retrospective protection to be given to United States literary works by South Korea will also be extended to British works; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: The agreement between the United States of America and Korea on copyright and certain other matters has only just been announced, and the full details are not yet known. However, I understand that the agreement provides for copyright protection in Korea for foreign works published since 1977. I do not yet know the extent of this protection, and whether it will apply to works first published in the United Kingdom, but urgent inquiries are being made on these points.

Mr. Abse asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his policy on the protection of British copyright in the light of the United Kingdom Anti-Piracy Group's report "International Piracy—the threat to the British copyright industries", a copy of which was presented to him.

Mr. Pattie: The Government's policy is to provide all the support they can to United Kingdom copyright owners in their efforts to combat piracy of their material in overseas markets. They will continue to press for comprehensive and enforceable copyright law in countries which lack it, and to encourage and participate in international initiatives against piracy and counterfeiting, for example, within the general agreement on tariffs and trade, the World Intellectual Property Organisation, and the European Community. As President of the Council of the Community the Government will do all they can to take these initiatives forward.

The Government have agreed, in concert with their OECD partners, that trade-related aspects of intellectual property rights should be addressed in the new round of multilateral trade negotiations in the GATT, which it is hoped will be launched in September. They are also pressing that protection of foreign intellectual property rights should be included in Community discussions on trade matters with appropriate countries.

The Government were grateful for the report of the anti-piracy group and for the valuable information it contained. They hope to be in a position in the early autumn to discuss with the copyright industries the development of a detailed strategy in regard to those countries where copyright piracy and counterfeiting are most prevalent, following consultations with other countries whose copyright industries are also affected.

F. W. Clews (Furnishers) Ltd.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether F. W. Clews (Furnishers) Ltd. has lodged all its accounts as required under the Companies Acts; if he will list its last registered directors; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: This company re-registered with unlimited liability on 1 April 1982 and, as a result, was not required to file accounts with the Registrar of Companies from that date. At the time of re-registration, filing of accounts was up-to-date. The current directors are shown on the public file as Alan Barry Kiley and K. T. Secretaries Ltd. The Registrar will strike the company off the register on 29 July 1986, because, on the basis of information supplied by the company, he has reason to believe that it is no longer in business or operation.

Midland Ideal Homes (Holdings) Ltd.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on what date the company entitled Midland Ideal Homes (Holdings) Ltd. was removed from the Register of Companies at Companies House; for what reason it was removed; who were the directors of the company at the date at which it was removed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: The company has not been removed from the register. It has been an unlimited liability company since 1 April 1982. The current directors are shown on the public file as Alan Barry Kiley and K T Secretaries Ltd.

Central Service (Kettering)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the date on which Central Service (Kettering) was first registered at Companies House; whether any action under the provisions of the Companies Acts has been taken against this company; and who were the last recorded directors of this company.

Mr. Howard: Central Services (Kettering) was originally registered as a limited company on 18 June 1958. It re-registered as unlimited on 3 February 1982, and was struck off the register on 14 January 1986, because the registrar had reason to believe that the company was no longer in business or operation. The last recorded directors were Alan Barry Kiley, Brian Wilfred Baggs and Leila Hart.

M. B. P. Russell and Co. Ltd.

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what reply has been given to the application of 21 April by M. B. P. Russell and Co. Ltd. for the appointment of inspectors; and when he expects to announce a decision on the matter.

Mr. Howard: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State does not propose to appoint inspectors for M. B. P. Russell & Co. Ltd., and the company has been informed accordingly.

Audio Tapes (Levy)

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he proposes to exempt hospital radio organisations from the proposed levy on blank tape.

Mr. Pattie: Under the proposals for a levy on blank audio compact cassettes announced in the White Paper "Intellectual Property and Innovation" (Cmnd. 9712), the levy collecting society will be required to give rebates of the levy to organisations making significant use of leviable tapes for purposes that do not infringe copyright. Thus, hospital radio stations using blank audio compact cassettes for such purposes will be eligible to claim a rebate.

Scotch Whisky (Japan)

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received from the Scottish Whisky Association about Japan's taxation of imported alcoholic drinks; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: The Department maintains close contact with the Scottish Whisky Association about the problem of discriminatory taxation of imported alcoholic drinks in Japan. The Foreign Affairs Council of the European Community has recently invited the Commission to press for early action to remove discriminatory import barriers, with a view to initiating action under the GATT if this is not successful.

Goods and Services (Contracts)

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to the proportions of total sales by United Kingdom companies which were accounted for by (a) Government Departments, (b) local government, (c) nationalised industries and (d) non-departmental public sector bodies in each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Butcher: The information is not available.

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has in respect of British Shipbuilders, British Steel and the Post Office as to the total amount spent on the acquisition of goods and services, expressed in terms of the net contract prices; and how many individual contracts comprised that value of purchasing, for each of the last five years for which figures are available, giving both the overall totals in each case and the totals disaggregated into the following categories (a) capital and revenue expenditure, (b) construction and non-construction projects, (c) goods and services purchased from United Kingdom-based companies and non-United Kingdom-based companies and (d) goods and services purchased from the private sector and from other parts of the public sector.

Mr. Butcher: British Shipbuilders, British Steel and the Post Office estimate that their purchases of raw materials, goods and services amount to just less than £4,000 million a year. I regret that figures are not available over a period of five years and that within this total figure it is not possible to identify purchases in the detail requested.

GEC-Plessey

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has yet received the report of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission on the General Electric Company takeover bid for Plessey; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Terry Fields asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he received the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on the proposed merger between Plessey and GEC; if he will publish the report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: My right hon. Friend received the MMC's report on the proposed merger between GEC and Plessey on 18 July. He will announce the outcome of the MMC's investigation, and publish its report, as soon as practicable.

Counterfeiting

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the effect of abolition of the anti-counterfeiting unit in his Department on the prevention of industrial counterfeiting.

Mr. Pattie: The unit reviewed the problems arising from counterfeiting of goods. The Government are as determined as ever to combat counterfeiting, and look forward to early adoption of proposed European Community legislation. We shall work in the forthcoming GATT negotiations for adoption of a code on counterfeiting. My Department's new unfair trade unit follows up individual complaints about international trading practices, including counterfeiting.

Egypt (Trade)

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what items entered into trade between the United Kingdom and Egypt in each of the years 1981 to 1985, inclusive, giving their values.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information within acceptable cost limits is given in the table.

British Shipbuilders

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has received British Shipbuilders annual report and accounts for 1985-86 and the 1986-87 corporate plan.

Mr. Peter Morrison: In accordance with sections 17(9) and 18(6) of the Aircraft and Shipbuilding Industries Act 1977, I am laying before each House copies of British Shipbuilders' annual report and accounts for 1985-86. I am also placing in the Library a version of British Shipbuilders 1986-87 corporate plan, with commercially confidential information deleted.

The corporation made a total historic cost trading loss of £125 million in 1985-86. The trading loss on the continuing business was £137 million. This includes provisions against the possible calling of customer credit guarantees of £43 million and under-recovered overheads of £41 million. The extent of the under-recovered overheads underlines the need for the action announced by British Shipbuilders in May to bring capacity more closely into line with anticipated work load.

As I announced on 16 June, British Shipbuilders' external financing limit in 1986-87 has been increased to £130 million to accommodate the costs of the restructuring announced on 14 May. The corporate plan presented by British Shipbuilders is intended to allow it to maintain its business at the size it will reach after the present restructuring. The Government accept this plan, but its success will depend on sufficient orders being won. The Government's intention is to continue to set tight and degressive levels of financial support.

British Steel Corporation

Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is able to announce a revised external financing limit for the British Steel Corporation; and if he will make a statement about the corporation's financial target.

Mr. Morrison: I am glad to be able to tell the House that BSC's external financing limit for the current year has been reduced by £95 million from £146 million to £51 million. This reflects a revised view of the outlook for the year, taking account of recent changes in external conditions. Exchange rate developments and a reduced need for working capital to finance stocks have played a major part.

I am also able to announce an interim financial target for the corporation. In recent years BSC has had to work to annual rather than medium-term targets, and although I hope next year to establish a medium-term target, it has not proved practicable to do so at this stage. The Government have set a target for the financial year 1986-87 of a return of 5 per cent. before interest and exceptional items on BSC's total capital employed, including short-term borrowings, as at 29 March 1986.

Iran (Car Kits)

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what further support is to be provided for the contract between Peugeot-Talbot motor company and Iran for the sale of car kits.

Mr. Alan Clark: The cover to which my predecessor referred in his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) on 28 October 1985, at column 310, has been extended for a further limited period.

Company Law (Reform)

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has for the reform of company law.

Mr. Howard: My Department has today published a consultative document on reform of the ultra vires rule inviting comments on the report on that subject which Dr. Dan Prentice of Oxford university has prepared at my request. Copies of the document have been placed in the Library. A further consultative document on requirements regarding the filing of annual returns and accounts at the companies registration offices will be published shortly. More generally, we are considering a number of other possible reforms with the need to remove unnecessary administrative burdens and the particular interests of small companies very much in mind.

Register of Companies

Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress has been made by the Companies Registration Office to improve the reliability of the Register of Companies.

Mr. Howard: As was reported to the Public Accounts Committee on 20 June 1984, the Registrar of Companies has been aiming to achieve compliance by 80 per cent. of the companies on the register by the middle of 1986. I reported to the House on progress on 11 December 1985.

At 30 June 1986, 88 per cent. of active companies were up to date with their filing of annual returns and 84 per cent. up-to-date with accounts. These figures compare with 52 and 45 per cent. respectively at the end of May 1984.

79·4 per cent. of active companies were compliant for both returns and accounts (compared with 41·0 per cent. in May 1984). A further 12·2 per cent. had been in default for less than six months.

I am pleased with the progress that has been made. I have asked the Registrar of Companies to maintain the pressure on compliance and to try to raise further the level of it. This will not be easy—it will mean a good deal of further hard work for him and his staff.

However, an up-to-date register is vital if creditors, potential investors and others who have dealings with companies, are to have the information they need to take soundly based decisions. The public availability of the data is also an important deterrent to fraud.

The registrar could not have made the progress he has without the co-operation of the business and professional community, which I gratefully acknowledge. I am sure that this co-operation will continue as the registrar and his staff maintain their efforts.

Small Companies (Financial Information)

Mr. Knowles asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he is able to give details of the measures announced on 22 May, Official Report, columns 247-48, to relax the amount of financial information that small companies have to disclose in their accounts.

Mr. Howard: The financial thresholds defining small and medium-sized companies will be increased so that over 90 per cent. of companies will now have the option of filing modified accounts at companies registration offices. I intend to introduce the necessary subordinate legislation shortly.

We have also decided to reduce the amount of information that small companies are required to give shareholders in full accounts. However, shareholders will still be able to ask for all the information to which they are entitled at present under the Companies Act. We aim to bring this proposal forward at the first opportunity for primary legislation.

I shall be considering the practicalities further in consultation with the profession.

ENERGY

Sellafield

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will indicate the extent of leakage of all types from the British Nuclear Fuels concrete storage silos at Sellafield; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: I am advised by British Nuclear Fuels plc that there are two concrete silos, B41 and B38, located at Sellafield, containing solid wastes arising from the reprocessing of irradiated fuel. B41 contains approximately 5,000 cubic metres of solid waste retained in a dry environment to which no further additions have been made since 1964. Environmental and structural conditions are routinely monitored and demonstrate a completely stable situation with no problems relating to aerial or liquid discharges.

B38 contains approximately 9,000 cubic metres of solid waste retained in water filled compartments. Localised ground contamination found in 1970 during B38 phase II construction was attributed to a below-ground leak from one of the compartments of phase I. Measurements demonstrated that the activity released was firmly held in the clay sub-strata and did not extend beyond three to four metres from source. Group activity continues to be stable, with no further migration of activity, as evidenced by frequent routine monitoring and groud surveys, both in the immediate vicinity of the silo and elsewhere within the site boundaries.

Silo water level measurements have indicated that there have been no further leakages. This is attibuted to the leak path being blocked by the particulate products of magnesium corrosion, a natural process where Magnox fuel cladding material is stored under water.

Subsequent phases of B38 silo construction have utilised different design concepts, allowing for double containment, inter-space leak detection, and return of any leakage to silo. Cooling and recirculation systems were also installed in later compartments to control reaction rates and maintain low temperatures. No further leakages have occurred.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he is satisfied with current storage arrangements for spent Magnox fuel at Sellafield; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: Yes. I am advised by British Nuclear Fuels plc that the new fuel handling plant is being commissioned, that receipts of irradiated fuel from Magnox stations are now received there prior to reprocessing, and that excellent storage conditions prevail.

The inventory of Magnox fuel received prior to commissioning of the fuel handling plant is held in one of the older Sellafield storage ponds and work is in hand to have this fuel reprocessed so that the pond can be prepared for eventual decommissioning.

Nuclear Reactors

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish the report of the safety and reliability directorate entitled "The Consequences of a Hydrogen Explosion in B38 Magnox Silo Second Extension".

Mr. Goodlad: No. I am advised that the document, which was commissioned from the Safety and Reliability Directorate (SRD) by British Nuclear Fuels plc, was one of a number of studies which formed part of the consideration by Her Majesty's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate of the safety case for the second extension of the B38 Magnox silo. Subsequent to the SRD study, improvements have been progressively introduced to the existing silos and to the design proposed for the second extension, following which Her Majesty's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate gave consent for its operation in February 1982.

Plutonium

Mr. Robin Cook asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list all those establishments which were licensed to handle plutonium in each year since 1956; if he will describe the procedures by which establishments receive a licence to handle plutonium and list those establishments for which applications for new or renewed licences are pending and, for each establishment, indicate the owners and operators of each establishment and site during each year it has been so licensed.

Mr. Goodlad: The Health and Safety Executive does not issue licences for the specific purpose of handling plutonium. However, BNFL's Sellafield and Springfields sites are licensed, inter alia, to handle plutonium. Licences are issued in accordance with section 1(1) of the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate Act 1965. In addition, any person, other than the Crown or the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority requires a permit to carry out the treatment of irradiated nuclear fuel so as to extract therefrom plutonium. Such permits are granted by the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority or a Government Department, and are required in addition to a current nuclear site licence. British Nuclear Fuels plc has held a permit in respect of its site at Sellafield since 1971.

The function and powers of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority to deal with all kinds of radioactive substances including plutonium, are given in the Atomic Energy Authority Act 1954 and related legislation.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Energy if, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury of 14 February, Official Report, column 566, he will indicate (a) to which organisations the plutonium exported to France in the years stated in his reply was transferred, (b) whether the plutonium was loaned or sold, or exchanged for an equivalent quantity of nuclear material, (c) under whose ownership this plutonium now resides, (d) whether any of the exported plutonium has since been reimported in any form, (e) whether the plutonium was processed or manufactured in any way whilst in France, (f) whether one export licence for such materials covers more than one contract or more than one load and (g) what other nuclear materials have been exported, and in which years; in relation to (g), which materials were involved, and in what chemical and physical form they were when exported in each year; and which of these exports were subject to an export licence.

Mr. Goodlad: This information could be supplied only at disproportionate cost.

South Africa

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give details of the controls introduced to enforce the ban on the sale and export of oil to South Africa as agreed in the Commonwealth accord on southern Africa adopted on 20 October 1985.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I refer to my reply of 6 February 1984 to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) at column 460.

North Sea Oil

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met representatives of the oil companies to discuss Government policy towards the development of North sea oil; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: My right hon. Friend and I frequently meet representatives of the oil companies both formally and informally, and will continue to do so, to discuss all matters of mutual interest.

Severn Barrage

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects the final study of the Severn barrage project to be completed.

Mr. David Hunt: I expect that the advanced investigations and site exploration of a Severn barrage on a line near to Cardiff and Weston which my right hon. Friend announced on 9 July will be completed in approximately two years.

NCB (Enterprise) Ltd.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many jobs have been created as a result of the activities of NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. in each region; how many potential jobs have been created; how much money has been invested; and if he will list for each region the name of the firm, its main activities, the number of jobs before NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. activities, and the number of people employed at the latest known date.

Mr. David Hunt: At 28 June 1986, NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. to be known as British Coal Enterprise Ltd. from 31 July, had committed £12·9 million to 639 projects to help create 5,203 job opportunities initially and another 3,025 potential job opportunities, without further investment. The regional breakdown is as follows:

Region	Initial jobs created	Further jobs	Total
Scotland	1,107	595	1,702
North East	848	249	1,097
Yorkshire	1,097	684	1,781
Midlands	458	201	659
Western	400	386	786
South Wales	1,193	877	2,070
South East	100	33	133
TOTAL	5,203	3,025	8,288

It is not NCB (Enterprise) Ltd.'s policy to publish details of the individuals and firms assisted. To do so would be a breach of commercial confidentiality.

Community Programme

Mr. Prescott asked the Secretary of State for Energy what plans exist for new community programme opportunities to be provided by his Department.

Mr. Peter Walker: My Energy Efficiency Office sponsors a national initiative within the community programme which provides a low-cost or free insulation service for low-income households. This programme has insulated almost 200,000 homes since it began, and currently employs around 5,000 in 270 separate local projects; 200 more projects are being planned, and I expect perhaps 80 of those to start up, creating another 1,500 jobs, by the end of the year, with further expansion thereafter.

There are no present plans to sponsor new employment programmes beyond the one I have mentioned.

British Coal (Northern Area)

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what information he has as to how many tonnes of coal per month were produced by how many miners at how many pits in British Coal northern area (a) in the most recent month for which figures are available and (b) in February 1984; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will provide details of improvements in productivity reported to his Department by British Coal for its northern area.

Mr. David Hunt: The total deep mine revenue output, number of pits, average men on colliery books and average revenue output per man shift for the north-east area of the NCB in June 1986 and February 1984 were as follows:

	June 1986 (four weeks)	February 1984 (four weeks)
Revenue output (thousand tonnes)	893	846
Number of pits	9	16
Average manpower	16,930	22,990
Output per man shift (tonnes)	3·08	2·20

Men and management in the north-east are to be congratulated on this record growth in productivity which reflects a continuing effort by all concerned to reduce costs.

Goods and Services (Contracts)

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what information he has in respect of the British Gas Corporation, the Central Electricity Generating Board, the Electricity Council and British Coal as the total amount spent on the acquisition of goods and services expressed in terms of net contract prices; and how many individual contracts comprised that volume of purchasing for each of the last five years for which figures are available, giving both the overall totals for each case and the totals disaggregated into the following categories (a) capital and revenue expenditure, b) construction and non-construction projects, (c) goods and services purchased from United Kingdom-based companies and non-United Kingdom-based companies and (d) goods and services purchased from the private sector and from other parts of the public sector;

(2) what information he has in respect of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority as to the total amount spent on the acquisition of goods and services, expressed in the terms of net contract prices; and how many individual contracts comprised that volume of purchasing for each of the last five years for which figures are available, giving both the overall totals for the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority and the totals disaggregated into the following categories: (a) capital and revenue expenditure, (b) construction and non-construction projects, (c) goods and services purchased from United Kingdom-based companies and non United Kingdom-based companies and (d) goods and services purchased from the private sector and from other parts of the public sector.

Mr. Peter Walker: These are matters for the industries.

Coal

Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give for each year since 1979 to date (a) the amount of coal/solid fuel used by all sources in the United Kingdom, (b) the amount of coal exported and to which country and (c) the amount of coal in stock.

Mr. David Hunt: The information requested is as follows:

Nuclear Power Stations

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information was provided to the International Atomic Energy Agency on the performance of the Dounreay nuclear power station in 1984 for publication in the International Atomic Energy Agency's report, "Operating Experience with Nuclear Power Stations in Member States in 1984."

Mr. Goodlad: I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

British Gas

Mr. Bright asked the Secretary of State for Energy what incentives will be offered to encourage small investors to purchase shares in the forthcoming sale of British Gas.

Mr. Peter Walker: We have decided that small investors will be offered a choice of incentives when the sale of British Gas takes place. They will be able to opt either for gas vouchers, to help pay their domestic gas bills, or for an issue of bonus shares. Small investors will qualify for these incentives by continuing to hold their British Gas shares for specified periods after the sale. Further details will be announced closer to the flotation.

Electricity (Revenue Collection)

Mr. Bill Walker asked the Secretary of State for Energy what progress has been made by the electricity supply industry in responding to the report by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission on the revenue collection system of four area electricity boards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: I have now received from the Electricity Council a second response to the report of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission published in January 1985 on the revenue collection systems of the East Midlands, South Eastern, North Eastern and South Western area electricity boards (Cmnd. 9427). This describes progress on steps taken by the industry to meet the commission's conclusions. I am placing copies of the response in the Library of the House.

The industry has made useful progress in considering the MMC's recommendations since my statement to the House on 25 July 1985 concerning the initital response, and has been able to reach a considered response on a number of issues. I welcome this.

The commission's central conclusions dealt with the variations which it found in boards' differing practices and procedures for revenue collection. The response indicates that the council is now well advanced in carrying through a systematic and detailed study of these differences across all 12 area boards. The study is designed to lead to the indentification and implementation of best practice wherever possible throughout the industry, taking due account of boards' local circumstances. The recent internal reorganisation of the Electricity Council mentioned in the response to conclusions 4 and 5 should assist progress towards this goal.

In conclusion 8, the commission recommended that each board should set a quantified cost objective for revenue collection as a whole with the medium term objective of achieving continued cost reduction in real terms. The reference boards have accepted this general objective and reviewed their practices and productivity accordingly. The specific objectives set by the four boards are detailed in the response. SEEB has now established an audit committee as recommended by the commission at conclusion 10. Although NEEB has not followed this example, I have noted that it is taking steps to increase the participation of non-executive members in looking at specific issues including the comparative performance of the board.

A number of other recommendations raise complex issues relevant to all 12 boards, not just the four examined, and the wider implications of these are being actively pursued by the industry. The Electricity Council is continuing to direct and co-ordinate follow-up work to ensure that full value is taken from the investigation. I shall take a close interest in developments and have asked the council chairman to let me have a further report on progress in the course of next year, by which time I hope that follow-up action will have been completed.

In my statement of 25 July 1985 I noted that the industry had recognised the desirability of greater consistency in the application of performance indicators to revenue collection. As the commission points out, consistency is also desirable in the methods of cost allocation which underlie inter-board performance comparisons. The council's new general management committee, which has a specific duty to monitor board's corporate objectives and performance targets and to review the appropriateness and effectiveness of performance indicators, will be taking the lead in this.

I should like to take this opportunity to convey the Government's thanks to the MMC for its constructive and effective investigation. The Government value its findings in the effort to reduce costs and increase efficiency.

WALES

Acute Surgery (Waiting Lists)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the number of people on the waiting lists for acute surgery every six months since September 1982 for each health authority in Wales.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Acute surgery is not a category which is used in relation to waiting list information. The following table gives information on general surgery waiting lists, including urology, for urgent in-patients, non-urgent in-patients and out-patients.

Sheep (Radiation)

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will place in the Library details of the following: (a) how many live lambs have been tested in Wales since 1 May for an excess of radiation, (b) by parishes, where the tests were performed and (c) the results of such testing; if he will introduce a system of continuing local monitoring of radiation levels in sheep in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: All the results of tests on lambs are being placed in the Library of the House. I regret the information is not readily available according to parish boundaries. The monitoring of radio caesium levels in lambs is continuing.

Tests have now identified further areas where restrictions on the movement and slaughter of sheep can be lifted. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and I have therefore today laid a new order under the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985, to come into effect at midnight, to release areas in Gwynedd, Clwyd and Powys.

A map which shows the areas to be released in more detail and the results of tests up to 21 July are being published today and a copy is being placed in the Library of the House.

Chernobyl Incident (Environmental Information)

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make available, separately, the Welsh data included in the National Radiological Protection Board's compilation of environmental information collected in response to the Chernobyl accident.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: An extract of the data covering Wales is being published today. A copy is being placed in the Library of the House.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Nuclear Test Ban

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the implications of the latest United States nuclear weapon test for Her Majesty's Government's attitude towards a further summit between the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; whether Her Majesty's Government have any involvement in this test; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: We share the widespread hope that there will be a summit meeting between President Reagan and Mr. Gorbachev this year, and that it will succeed in reaching decisions on arms control. This view is not affected by the latest United States test which was not related to the United Kingdom nuclear programme.

Cultural Representation (USA)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the annual cost of, and how many people are involved in, the United Kingdom's cultural representation in the United States of America.

Mr. Eggar: The British Council's country programme costs for the United States in 1986-87 are estimated to be £613,000. It employs one and a half United Kingdom based staff and two local staff, who work from her Majesty's embassy in Washington. In addition, four locally engaged staff paid for by the FCO work full time in the cultural section of the embassy, at an estimated cost of £48,000.

A large number of private organisations are involved in British cultural activities in the USA but their cost is not quantifiable.

Chemical Weapons

Sir John Osborn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the United Kingdom's recent initiative on chemical weapons.

Mr. Renton: Her Majesty's Government attaches a high priority to the conclusion of a comprehensive and verifiable ban on chemical weapons. Although some progress has been made on verification arrangements at certain declared sites, a serious obstacle remains on the verification mechanism of last resort challenge inspection. A valuable standard for the stringency that will be required for a challenge inspection regime has been set by the United States draft treaty, tabled in the negotiations in April 1984. However, the Soviet Union has refused to negotiate on these ideas.

On 15 July I tabled a new United Kingdom paper at the conference on disarmament, CD715, "Verification and Compliance—The Challenge Element" designed to seek a way forward in this vitally important area. Our proposals would give each state a right to request a challenge inspection. The challenged state would then be under an obligation to demonstrate compliance within a tight time scale of 10 days. The obligation would normally be met by comprehensive investigation by an international team; but direct inspection could be refused in exceptional circumstances, subject to the challenged state being able to demonstrate its compliance by other means.

We believe these ideas would impose a stringent political obligation on a challenged state which would deter any contemplated violation; they would at the same time enable a state to safeguard its legitimate security interests.

I have placed copies of the United Kingdom working paper and of my speech to the conference on disarmament in the Library.

In my speech I asked the conference to set itself the goal of presenting a complete chemical weapons invention to the United Nations General Assembly in 1987. That remains our aim.

Hong Kong

Sir Paul Bryan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied with the state of public and private housing in Hong Kong; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to him by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on 20 May at column 143.

Sir Paul Bryan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied with the opportunities for sport available to the people in Hong Kong; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The provision of sports facilities in Hong Kong continues to improve and expand through co-operation between the Hong Kong Government, the municipal councils, the governing bodies of sport and voluntary organisations. Opportunities now exist for the population to participate in almost every type of sporting activity at all levels. Sporting facilities, including multi-purpose indoor stadia, international standard swimming pool complexes, athletics grounds and water sport centres are provided by the urban and regional councils. In addition, since its completion in 1982, the Jubilee sports centre has been the focal point for sports training, and has provided excellent facilities for many sports.

Chile

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, what representations he has received in relation to recent abuses of human rights in Chile as regards the arrests of Messrs Soto Tellez, Cifuentes Cifuentes, Vega Poza, Ecobar Sanchez, Gamboa Alaredo, Sanhueza Azaredo, Rojas de Negri and Ms Quintana Arancibia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: None. We share the widely felt concern over the human rights abuses associated with the 2-3 July national strike, especially the death of Sr Rojas and the injuries suffered by Srta Quintana. We welcome the appointment of a civilian judge to investigate these cases and hope that he will report fully on the facts.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what meetings with human rights, trade union and community organisations in Chile have been held by British diplomatic staff since November 1984.

Mr. Eggar: We have regular contact with Chilean human rights, trade union and community organisations both in Santiago and London.

El Salvador

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what human rights organisations in El Salvador have held meetings with British diplomatic representatives in the current year.

Mr. Eggar: This year our representatives in El Salvador have held meetings with two local human rights organisations, the Commission on Human Rights and Tutela Legal, as well as the Roman Catholic Church. They have also met others with an interest in the subject, for example, the London-based El Salvador committee for human rights, the World Council of Churches, Americas Watch, Christian Aid and Oxfam.

President Reagan

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his recent meeting with President Reagan.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend met President Reagan in Washington on 18 July. They discussed South Africa, East-West relations and the successful conclusion of the United Kingdom–United States supplementary extradition treaty. This meeting followed other talks with Vice-President Bush, Secretary Shultz and Senator Lugar, as well as with Mr. Malcolm Fraser of Australia.

Caste System

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will raise the operation of the caste system at the Commonwealth conference.

Mr. Eggar: The sole subject of the agenda of the forthcoming meeting of seven Commonwealth Heads of Government, scheduled for 3 to 5 August, is the review of the Commonwealth accord on southern Africa agreed last October at Nassau. The question of discussing the operation of the caste system thus does not arise.

Egypt

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on relations between the United Kingdom and Egypt and their implications for a middle east peace settlement.

Mr. Renton: Relations between the United Kingdom and Egypt are excellent. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told President Mubarak on 17 July, we are concerned at the current hiatus in the peace process. Britain and the Twelve remain ready to support any realistic initiative to promote a peaceful settlement.

Chemical Weapons

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether British representatives attended the workshop on chemical weapon arms control organised by the Netherlands Government in June in the Hague; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: A workshop on the verification of a chemical weapons ban was held in the Netherlands from 4 to 6 June 1986. Its main purpose was to evaluate an experimental inspection of a modern chemical plant to test in practice some verification procedures. Representatives attended this workshop from most of the delegations to the conference on disarmament. Three representatives attended from the United Kingdom, including the leader of the United Kingdom delegation, Dr. Ian Cromartie, who is this year chairing the chemical weapons negotiations.

The verification of non-production of chemical weapons will be an important element of a chemical weapons ban and the United Kingdom has tabled three papers on this topic. We were pleased that the experimental inspection was able to make use of the idea in these papers. We believe that the workshop has enabled valuable lessons to be drawn, which now need to be reflected in agreement in the negotiations.

ENVIRONMENT

Rates

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the amount of rates payable in the current financial year by, respectively, the agriculture, manufacturing and industry and commerce sectors generally; and how this compares with the contribution to local authority expenditure made by the Government and by other ratepayers.

Mrs. Rumbold: Following is a breakdown of rates payable to local authorities' rate funds for 1986-87 for Great Britain:

Rate yields by sector

	(£ billion)
Agriculture	0·0
Industry*	1·7
Commerce and Public Utilities	5·6

Planning Permission (Revocations)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many cases there have been since May 1979 in which planning permission has been revoked under sections 45 and 46 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971; in how many of these compensation has been paid by the local authority, and by his Department respectively; and if he has reimbursed part or all of any compensation paid by a local authority arising out of a revocation order.

Mr. Tracey: Statistics are available only for the period from April 1979 to December 1985. In that period 993 revocation orders were confirmed by the Secretary of State. No statistics are available for unopposed orders where his confirmation was not required.

Compensation under these provisions is paid by the local planning authority, and information on amounts paid as a result is not available centrally.

Waste Management (Report)

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will publish the Government's response to the eleventh report of the Royal Commission on environmental pollution, entitled, "Managing Waste: the Duty of Care."

Mr. Ridley: The Government's response will be published on 15 September. In the meantime, I have arranged for typescript copies of the response to be placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Durham Beaches (Colliery Spoil)

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has completed his consideration of the representations made to him about the tipping of colliery spoil on the Durham beaches; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: The practice of tipping colliery spoil along the Durham coast has been recognised as a serious environmental problem by successive Governments for some 20 years. There are, however, no easy solutions which do not pose a threat to jobs.

In recent years tipping has ceased at Blackhall and extensive reclamation works removing the evidence of a long history of despoliation have been carried out, paid for by derelict land grant; at Horden and Easington some improvements have been made in recent years by the construction by British Coal of an experimental spoil disposal pipeline funded in part by my Department, and a spoil conveyor respectively. Tipping at Horden will cease by the Autumn and reclamation work funded by derelict land grant will start this year to remove the legacy of dereliction. Reclamation works are also planned at Easington. The Dawdon complex at Seaham is now the most urgent problem in this area. Late last year my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy and I met the hon. Member for Easington (Mr. Dormand) and representatives from the local authorities to discuss the situation in the area. At that meeting the local authority representatives pressed for beach tipping to be brought to an end and for the waste either to be dumped at sea or else taken inland to fill quarries and urged the Government to fund any additional costs involved. We have closely examined these proposals. We are satisfied that the disposal of waste at sea is not an acceptable alternative on environmental grounds. The disposal of waste to quarries inland would present fewer environmental problems, but the site proposed does not have sufficient capacity to take all the spoil that is expected to be produced over the life of the collieries. The costs of transportation are in any event high and could not be borne by the collieries concerned without placing their future in jeopardy, thus posing a serious threat to jobs in an area of high unemployment. We have carefully considered whether these additional costs should be funded by central Government. We have concluded that this would not be in accordance with this Government's commitment to the polluter pays principle. It must be for the industry—and ultimately the consumer—to pay the costs of meeting the environmental standards of the day. In practice these standards have to take into account the benefits that can be achieved and the costs they impose on industry. Clearly the benefits to be gained from the option of disposal at inland quarries could not be achieved without putting at risk the 6,000 jobs in the mines which currently dispose of waste at Seaham. That is not a practical solution.

We have therefore concluded that a partial solution proposed by British Coal, which would result in a concentration of tipping at the Bankside disposal point, while perpetuating undesirable beach tipping, represents the best practicable environmental option, at least in the short term. This would enable real environmental improvements to be made at a reasonable cost without placing jobs at risk.

This scheme will also provide substantial opportunities for reclamation at Noses Point and around the colliery and this work forms part of the proposal put forward by British Coal. There will also be opportunities to reclaim colliery despoliation away from the immediate vicinity of the mine, for example, the Blast Beach, and qualifying schemes will receive a high priority in the derelict land grant programme in the region. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy and I are calling on the local authorities and British Coal to come forward jointly with reclamation schemes for this area in order that we may together improve an extremely despoiled environment as quickly as possible.

Goods and Services (Contracts)

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has in respect of local authorities as to the total amount spent on the acquisition of goods and services, expressed in terms of the net contract prices; and how many individual contracts comprised that volume of purchasing for each of the last five years for which figures are available, giving both the overall totals for each local authority and the total disaggregated into the following categories: (a) capital and revenue expenditure, (b) construction and non-construction projects, (c) goods and services purchased from United Kingdom-based companies and non-United Kingdom-based companies and (d) goods and services purchased from the private sector and other parts of the public sector.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information is not available centrally.

Royal Docks (STOLport)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to ensure that the London Docklands Development Corporation complies with the code of practice concerning consultation with local authorities, as required by section 140 of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 in respect of planning applications relating to the proposed STOL airport in the Royal docks.

Sir George Young: The corporation has informed my Department of the steps it is taking to comply with the code of practice in respect of planning applications relating to STOLport, and I am satisfied.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the amounts in rate support grant paid to the city of Liverpool in each of the financial years 1974-75 and 1985-86, inclusive, giving the percentage change in each case.

Mrs. Rumbold: The rate support grant paid to the city of Liverpool in respect of the years 1974-75 to 1985-86 inclusive are shown in cash terms, along with the year-on-year percentage changes.

	£ million	Percentage change from previous year
(1) 1974-75 to 1980-81
1974-75	65·6	—
1975-76	81·3	+23·8
1976-77	85·9	+5·8
1977-78	95·1	+10·7
1978-79	102·6	+7·9
1979-80	116·2	+13·2
1980-81	141·1	+21·4
(2) 1981-82 to 1985-86
1981-82	120·5	See notes
1982-83	117·3	−2·7
1983-84	123·6	+5·4
1984-85	118·7	−4·0
1985-86	125·4	+5·6

Notes:

The figures for 1974-75 to 1980-81 are not comparable with those for 1981-82 to 1985-86 because:

i. They compromise the needs, resources and domestic elements whereas from 1981-82 onwards the figures comprise block grant and domestic rate relief grant;

ii. Grant in support of services provided by metropolitan county councils was paid to the districts up to 1980-81 and to the counties thereafter.

All figures are in cash terms. Those for 1981-82 are final entitlements. Domestic rate relief grant figures for 1983-84 and 1984-85 are final entitlements; those for 1985-86 are first estimates. Block grant figures for 1983-84 and 1984-85 are entitlements after holdback based upon provisional outturn; those for 1985-86 are entitlements after holdback based on budgets.

Birlsbury Wood

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, pursuant to the answer of 30 June, Official Report, column 366, he will now state the sum paid to the owners of Birlsbury Wood for not clearing the woodland; and if he will break down the figure given for woodland agreements into individual woodlands.

Mrs. Rumbold: It is not my Department's practice to give details of individual agreements.

Croxteth Hall and County Park, Liverpool

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the future of Croxteth Hall and Country Park, Liverpool, before the summer Adjournment.

Mrs. Rumbold: The residuary body, in conjuction with the Countryside Commission, has consulted widely on the prospects of the future of Croxteth and on the alternatives for its long-term management. Croxteth is a much valued amenity, which receives widespread support. My right hon. Friend and I are glad that there has now been so much open discussion about the opportunities it offers, rather than pessimistic talk about closure.

There is much support for the view that the best way forward now would be to set up a trust charged with both the ownership and management of Croxteth Hall and Country Park. With good will on all sides such a trust could attract financial assistance from a variety of sources and manage the estate as a whole. We would hope that local district councils would form the nucleus of the trust and bear the primary responsibility for safeguarding Croxteth's future. However, there will be others with a positive role to play, and opportunities for a number of national agencies concerned with the heritage and tourism to give financial support. I will now be discussing with the chairman of the residuary body the details of setting up a trust. In the meantime, he will be commissioning a marketing survey and a new management plan which can then be used as the blueprint for Croxteth's management team.

Homeless Families

Mr. Shore asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will take steps to extend the definitions of accommodation within current housing legislation such as would allow a local authority to accommodate homeless families on moored ships;

(2) what approaches he has received from the London borough of Tower Hamlets seeking his approval for plans to accommodate homeless families on shipping moored on the Thames; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend has received no such approaches. It is for the local authority concerned to consider how to fulfil its duties to secure accommodation for homeless people under part III of the Housing Act 1985, having regard to our code of guidance and its powers under housing and other legislation.

Mr. Shore asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many homeless families are currently housed in bed and breakfast accommodation in each of the London boroughs; and what is the estimated cost per annum, for each council concerned.

Sir George Young: I refer the right hon. Member to my Department's published tables of homeless households reported by local authorities for the first quarter of 1986, and to the reply to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) on 23 June on the cost to local authorities. Copies of the relevant papers have been placed in the Library.

Housing Investment Programme

Mr. Shore asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the current housing investment programme allocation to each of the London boroughs.

Sir George Young: HIP allocations for 1986-87 are at column 1. Most boroughs supplement their allocations with the prescribed proportion of available capital receipts. They therefore spend well above their basic allocations; provisional expenditure figures for 1985-86 are at column 2.

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he proposes to give in the next allocation of housing investment programme moneys to Lambeth borough council to the demand for house renovation grants along with other demands on resources for housing in Lambeth.

Sir George Young: Decisions on the method of allocating housing resources for 1987-88 will be taken in the autumn in the usual way, after consultation with the local authority associations.

Housing Improvements Grants

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much has been (a) allocated and (b) spent on housing improvement repair grants in each of the last 10 financial years up to and including 1986-87 for (i) England and Wales and (ii) Northampton.

Mr. John Patten: The following is the available information on the amounts of repair grants paid.

	England and Wales £'000	Northampton £

Figures for earlier years for England and Wales could be provided only at disproportionate cost: earlier returns from Northampton are not available.

Separate allocations for repair grants are not made.

Hazardous Waste

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to how many tons of hazardous waste have been imported into the United Kingdom every year since 1983.

Mrs. Rumbold: My Department's Hazardous Waste Inspectorate recorded in its 1986 report that the approximate annual totals of hazardous waste imported into the United Kingdom during 1983, 1984 and 1985 were respectively 15,000, 5,000 and 25,000 tonnes.

Victoria and Albert Museum

Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made by the inquiry set up to investigate the flooding at the Victoria and Albert museum on 21-22 March; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: Early in the morning of 22 March 1986 it was discovered that a temporary water main at the Victoria and Albert museum had failed, causing serious flooding of the basement area and damage to the artifacts stored there. On 25 March, at cols. 425-26, I announced that, in consultation with my right hon. Friend the Minister of the Arts, I had ordered a full independent investigation into the accident. The inquiry, led by Mr. John Bartlett, CBE, MA, FENG, FICE, has now produced its report.

The inquiry concludes that the flooding is attributable to the failure of a joint on a temporary mains pipe as the joint came under increasing water pressure during the night. The temporary main was installed by a contractor employed by the Property Services Agency while he carried out his main task of replacing the existing services (drainage, water, gas, electricity) in the east access road which runs along the eastern side of the museum. A repair clamp was used to join an existing water pipe protruding from the museum wall to a new and different size pipe, which was part of a temporary diversion of the museum's mains pipe. The clamp is designed to repair damaged pipes and not to join separate pipes. On this occasion, however, it was used to connect two pipes of significantly different outside diameters, one of which fell outside the manufacturer's recommended range for the clamp used. The inquiry further considers that the joint and adjacent temporary pipework were inadequately propped when they were installed on 21 March, and that the overnight build up of pressure in the main was more than the repair clamp and the limited strutting were capable of resisting.

The inquiry found no evidence of flooding inside the V and A at 4.50 am on 22 March, when a warder patrolled the relevant section of the basement. It concludes that the joint failed in the early hours and that water started to enter the museum at about 5 am. Because of a combination of circumstances, water entered the basement for up to one and half hours before the flooding was discovered by warders on patrol at 6.25 am.

Once the alarm was raised, the museum staff acted with commendable speed to turn off the water supply and, with the assistance of the contractor, to start immediate pumping operations. Staff from the museum, the PSA, the fire brigade and the contractor dealt with the emergency speedily and efficiently over the weekend of 22-23 March. The cost of the damage was approximately £¼ million.

The contractor reassembled the temporary pipework on 22 March and instituted 24-hour surveillance of his site. Following an inspection of the reassembled temporary pipework by the contractor and the PSA, additional strutting was installed in a number of locations. The PSA has instructed the contractor that the relevant section of pipework should be dismantled in one piece when it is no longer required on site and sent for testing. The inquiry will report again should the results of these tests bring any new evidence to light.

The design and installation of the temporary mains were entirely the responsibility of the contractor, as for any other temporary work. The inquiry concludes that the PSA staff supervising the contract acted properly in the context of existing rules and guidance, but believes that there is a need to distinguish between such important and vulnerable temporary works and others. It therefore recommends that the agency should review the status of temporary work within a contract and consider creating a new category of temporary works where a client is relying on a vital service for a significant time and where its failure would have serious consequences for people other than the contractor. Such work should be accorded greater scrutiny, supervision and testing than is usual for temporary works.

Other recommendations made by the inquiry are that:

—the PSA and its clients should formally consider the risks associated with building projects during the design stages;

—the current review of the V and A's security systems should consider the need for alarms to indicate the presence of water and for bulkheads to prevent the flow of water;

— the V and A should review its night patrolling arrangements;

—the V and A should review its arrangements for calling in help in emergencies;

—floor plans should be readily available for use by the fire brigade and other emergency services;

— the national museum and galleries should consider establishing "salvage teams" for major accidents and formalising the arrangements for helping to deal with the consequences.

I am grateful to Mr. Bartlett and the other members of the inquiry team for their detailed and constructive report. I am also grateful to all those who co-operated with the inquiry team in their works and, in particular, to the director, trustees and staff of the V and A museum for the help they gave to the inquiry.

I have placed copies of the report in the Libraries of both Houses and I shall now be considering with my right hon. Friend the Minister for Arts and other interested parties how the report's recommendations should be followed through.

Merseyside Development Corporation

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what plans there are for the building of a private hospital on Merseyside Development Corporation land; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if there have been any representations to the Merseyside Development Corporation for the building of a private hospital; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 23 July 1986]: Merseyside Development Corporation has received a number of inquiries about the possibility of leasing land within its designated area for the establishment of private health care facilities. One such scheme incorporates a small private hospital. Negotiations are continuing.

Community Programme

Mr. Prescott asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans exist for new community programme opportunities to be provided by his Department.

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend the Minister for Environment, Countryside and Local Government announced in the House on 14 July, at column 683 a new initiative — UK 2000 — to encourage more local environmental improvement work by community programme teams and volunteers.

M25 (Shopping Developments)

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many planning applications for shopping developments within 10 miles either side of the M25 have been notified to his Department.

Sir George Young: Since the beginning of the current parliamentary Session, 20 such planning applications have been notified to the Department, either as departures from development plans, or in accordance with the request in DOE circular 96/77 to local planning authorities to inform the Secretary of State of planning applications for shopping developments outside existing city, town or district centres, involving gross floor space of 100,000 sq ft or more.

County of Avon

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those people and bodies which have made representations to him on the subject of planning appeals at Falfield, Hicks Common and Charfield, in the county of Avon.

Mr. Tracey: My Department has so far received representations in respect of the Hicks Common appeal from 260 individuals as well as from the Winterbourne parish council and the Winterbourne Society. No representations have yet been received in respect of the Charfield appeal. To date, no appeal has been received in respect of proposed residential development at Falfield.

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions, and in relation to which sites, in each of the last three years for which figures are available, a shortfall in the landbank has been a material consideration in his decisions to allow appeals against refusals of planning consent contrary to the Avon county structure plans.

Mr. Tracey: The availability of land for housing is a material consideration in all appeals involving residential development. It is not possible in the time available, except at disproportionate cost, to list all those cases in Avon has been subsequently allowed on appeal. However, housing land availability was a determining factor in the following large-scale residential appeals in Avon allowed in the last three years:

The Deans, Portishead
Weston Big Wood, Portishead
Castle Farm, Wickwar

London Docklands Development Corporation

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he has taken to ensure that all grant and funding moneys distributed by the London Docklands Development Corporation and drawn from the J4 local community budget have been allocated solely to local community projects, and that on no occasion funds from this local community budget have been passed to commercial companies or private individuals; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: I shall answer this question shortly.

Isle of Dogs

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans exist for the development of the London Docklands Development Corporation site in the Isle of Dogs currently occupied by the Mudchute Farm and Park Association; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The site occupied by the Mudchute Farm and Park Association is owned by the London borough of Tower Hamlets, not the London Docklands Development Corporation. Plans for the development of the site have been drawn up by the association and are presently under discussion.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Sunday Trading

15. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received seeking a change in the law on Sunday trading.

Mr. Waddington: Since the rejection of the Government's Bill on 15 April, we have received 48 representations seeking reform of the law on Sunday trading and two representations that maximum fines for breaches of Sunday trading regulations should be increased.

28. Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the Government's current policy towards Sunday trading.

32. Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he plans any further evaluation of Sunday trading.

70. Sir M. Fox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the partial deregulation of Sunday trading.

Mr. Waddington: In view of the recent rejection of the Government's Bill to deregulate shop opening hours, the Government have no plans at present to carry out any further review or to introduce new legislation.

Licensed Premises

16. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from membes of the public about opening hours in premises licensed to sell liquor; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Since 19 May, when my right hon. Friend announced the Government's support in principle for reform of permitted opening hours of licensed premises in England and Wales, we have received 22 letters from members of the public and 14 letters from hon. Members on behalf of constituents expressing views on the licensing hours. Of the 36, 22 supported relaxations in the law and 14 were opposed.

Victims of Crime

17. Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any proposals to increase the information available to his Department and the public about the age, sex, race and occupation of victims of crime; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We have no plans to increase the centrally collated information on victims beyond that already available to the Home Office from the British crime survey and the statistics on homicide. Publications this year by the Home Office in this area include the research report "Personal Violence" and articles in the "Home Office Research Bulletin".

Civil Defence

18. Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from local authorities about the implications of his Department's civil defence planning assumptions for the implementation by local authorities of the Civil Defence Regulations 1983.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Department has received comments on the Government's planning assumptions from a total of 46 local authorities (11 county and 35 district councils). Of these, 13 authorities (six county and seven district councils) have sought grant-aid for local planning assumptions studies.

20. Mr. Franks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his latest assessment of the extent to which local authorities are implementing the Civil Defence Regulations 1983.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Terlezki) on 22 July announcing our proposals for a planned programme for implementation of the Civil Defence Regulations 1983.

26. Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, in the light of the Chernobyl disaster, he will take steps to ensure that all local authorities comply with all the requirements of the Civil Defence Regulations 1983.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Government's review of contingency arrangements in the light of Chernobyl will include the role of local authorities. I would again refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to the question from my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Terlezki) on 22 July.

41. Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy, in implementing the provisions of the Civil Protection in Peacetime Act 1986, to require all local authorities to prepare local evacuation and relocation plans and to expedite local shelter surveys; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Civil Protection in Peacetime Act 1986 imposes no specific requirements on local authorities but will allow them to use their civil defence resources more flexibly in responding to peacetime emergencies. Advice on its implications is included with our proposals for a planned programme of implementation of the Civil Defence Regulations 1983. I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave him on 22 July.

59. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent discussions his Department has had with those local authorities who are still refusing to implement the 1983 Civil Defence Regulations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Terlezki) on 22 July. I am not aware of any outright refusal to implement the 1983 regulations, but we are considering representations from three authorities on the withholding of civil defence grant for failing to submit their civil defence plans as required by my right hon. Friend.

Birmingham Pub Bombings

19. Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make available a copy of the document in which the prison department accepted responsibility for the injuries inflicted on the six men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings.

Mr. Hurd: By an amended defence presented during exchange of pleadings in connection with the civil suits pursued by the six men against the Department it was admitted that the men had been assaulted and injured while in prison. It is not the usual practice to make such documents available to anyone other than the parties to the proceedings, but copies of the amended defence and an accompanying explanatory letter were made available to the solicitors of all plaintiffs.

37. Mr. Redmond asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to reach a conclusion of the review of the case of the Birmingham pub bombings.

Mr. Mellor: I cannot say when consideration of the case will be completed; that will depend on the extent of any further inquiries my right hon. Friend finds necessary. A decision will be reached as quickly as possible.

40. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has met the chief constable of the west midlands to discuss the implications for his force of the inquiry taking place into the case of the six men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings.

Mr. Mellor: No.

44. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why he did not ask a different police force to investigate whether the west midlands police had charged the wrong men with the Birmingham pub bombings.

Mr. Mellor: We saw no reason to approach a different police force. The report which my right hon. Friend sought was on Mr. Mullin's claims to have identified four men involved. It seemed sensible to seek this from the force which was most closely involved in the investigations and which has most knowledge of the case.

46. Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from prison officers, then at Winson Green prison, as to injuries on the six men later convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings at the time of their admission to the prison.

Mr. Mellor: I am not aware of any such representations.

51. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from the Archbishop of Westminster regarding any of the six men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings.

Mr. Mellor: Cardinal Hume wrote to my right hon. Friend on 19 November last to express his concern about the case and to ask that it be reopened.

53. Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make available a copy of the letter he has recently received from the chief constable of the west midlands regarding the Birmingham pub bombings.

Mr. Mellor: No.

66. Mr. Ernie Roberts asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from the Irish Government concerning the six men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings; and what was his response.

Mr. Mellor: Formal representations were made to the Government by the Government of the Republic of Ireland in October last year, expressing concern that a miscarriage of justice might have occurred, and asking that the case be reviewed. The Government reply noted the concern expressed, and indicated that my right hon. Friend would consider whether or not it would be right to refer the case to the Court of Appeal.

In addition, he has received two letters referring to the case from the Irish Minister for Foreign Affairs.

Racially Motivated Crimes

21. Mr. Mikardo asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last discussed with the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis and chief constables the subject of crimes with an apparently racial motive.

Mr. Hurd: I have discussed the problem of racially-motivated incidents with individual chief officers of police on many occasions since taking office. I last raised this issue in my speech to the summer conference of the Association of Chief Police Officers in June this year when I stressed that it is vital the police respond to racial attacks with understanding and are seen by the ethnic minority communities to do so.

52. Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his Department is currently conducting any research into racially motivated attacks; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) on 22 May 1986 at column 254.

61. Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further proposals he has to reduce the incidence of racially motivated offences.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) on 10 July 1986 at column 222.

Public Order Legislation

22. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many offences took place in England and Wales in 1985 which were related to public order legislation.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information that is available on offences recorded by the police relates to offences of riot, unlawful assembly, causing an affray, and placing and despatching articles to cause a bomb hoax, most of which are offences under common law. A total of 844 such offences were recorded by the police in England and Wales in 1985.

Crime Prevention

23. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, what recent representations he has received about Her Majesty's Government's crime prevention policy.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I am encouraged by the many letters we receive on crime prevention which show the increasing interest in our policy.

At last month's crime prevention seminar my right hon. Friend and I had a welcome opportunity to discuss and reach practical conclusions on the further development of that policy with representatives from a wide range of interests, including industry, trades unions, central and local government and education.

63. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any further proposals to increase financial support by his Department for crime prevention; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Government already make a significant contribution to crime prevention. This year the Home Office will spend some £2·5 million on crime prevention publicity, £682,000 on the crime prevention centre at Stafford and approximately £250,000 on research. The five-town crime prevention initiative will cost the Home Office £170,000 in the first year. Substantial funds for crime prevention projects are also available through the urban programme (£6·3 million in 1985) and community programmes (under which some 5,000 places for crime prevention have so far been approved.)

Burglary

24. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to reduce the incidence of burglary in high crime areas.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Home Office standing conference on crime prevention has established a working group on residential burglary. It is preparing a low-cost security package for inner city households. I understand the group is making good progress and will present its report at an open meeting of the standing conference on 18 November 1986.

Plastic Bullets

27. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received concerning the possible use of plastic bullets by the police in England and Wales.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Since 1 September last year we have received 101 letters from hon. Members and others about plastic baton rounds. Fourty two have expressed support for such equipment and 59 have expressed concern or opposition.

Drug Misuse

29. Mr. Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a further statement on the Government's strategy against the misuse of drugs.

Mr. David Mellor: The Government's five-point strategy for tackling drug misuse has been overseen and co-ordinated since July 1984 by the Ministerial Group on the Misuse of Drugs, which I chair. In that time we have intensified our response to the drugs problem on all fronts, and implemented a wide range of initiatives aimed at reducing both the supply of and the demand for drugs. I am sending my hon. Friend a copy of "Progress in the fight against drugs", a note summarising our measures and achievements since 1984, which has been placed in the Library and the Vote Office.

30. Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were serving prison sentences for drug trafficking offences on the most recent date for which figures are available; and how this compares with each of the previous three years.

Mr. Mellor: The information recorded centrally on prisoners relates to all drug offences and is published annually in "Prison Statistics England and Wales" (table 1.5 of the volume for 1984, Cmnd. 9622). The provisional figures for 1985 are 2,162 males and 189 females. Information on custodial sentences imposed for drug trafficking offences is published annually in "Statistics of the Misuse of Drugs; Supplementary Tables" (table 2.12 of the Issue for 1984, as revised in November 1985).

33. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made in the fight against drugs in the two years since the establishment of the ministerial group on the misuse of drugs.

Mr. Mellor: The Government's five-point strategy for tackling drug misuse has been overseen and co-ordinated since July 1984 by the ministerial group on the misuse of drugs, which I chair. In that time we have intensified our response to the drugs problem on all fronts, and implemented a wide range of initiatives aimed at reducing both the supply of and the demand for drugs. I am sending my hon. Friend a copy of "Progress in the fight against drugs", a note summarising our measures and achievements since 1984, which has been placed in the Library and the Vote Office.

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent provision he has made for dealing with the increase in drug abuse in rural areas.

Mr. Mellor: Under our five-point strategy we aim to combat drug misuse wherever it may occur. Measures of particular relevance to rural areas include a 27 per cent. increase during 1985 in the strength of police drugs squads in provincial forces; the expansion of treatment and rehabilitation services throughout England and Wales; allocation of £4 million to the appointment of a prevention co-ordinator in every local education authority; and the launch last week of the latest phase of our anti-heroin advertising campaign.

Crimes of Violence

34. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the change in the number of crimes of violence against the person in England and Wales in the year ended March 1986 compared with the year ended March 1979.

Mr. Mellor: 123,100 offences of violence against the person were recorded by the police in England and Wales in the 12 months ending 31 March 1986, 34,800 more than in the 12 months ending 31 March 1979. Numbers of offences recorded in the most recent 12-month period are published quarterly in Home Office statistical bulletins (table 4 of issue 16/86), and annual figures are published in the Command Paper "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales".

Immigration

31. Mr. Bill Walker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give details of the number of individuals who were refused admission to the United Kingdom in 1985 and in 1986 to date.

Mr. Waddington: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) on 10 July at column 221.

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many wives and children refused entry at each port in the Indian subcontinent in 1985 appealed against the refusal; how many of those appeals were (i) allowed, (ii) dismissed, (iii) withdrawn and (iv) are pending;

(2) how many (a) husbands and (b) fiancés refused wholly or partly on primary purpose grounds at each port in the Indian subcontinent in 1985 appealed against the refusal; and how many of those appeals in each category were (i) allowed, (ii) dismissed, (iii) withdrawn and (iv) are pending.

Mr. Waddington: The readily available information relates to appeals dealt with by the immigration appellate authorities in 1985, analysed by broad categories of appeal and broad nationality groups, and is given in the following table. Corresponding information on appeals outstanding is not readily available; the total number of appeals to adjudicators outstanding at the end of 1985, measured in terms of the number of cases, not appellants, was 1,262 for nationals of Bangladesh or India and 781 for nationals of Pakistan.

Appeals in respect of nationals of the Indian sub-continent refused entry clearance, dealt with in 1985

Dr. Frank Skuse

35. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Miss Maynard) on 20 February, Official Report, column 307, what were the public interest grounds for the early retirement of Dr. Frank Skuse from his Department's laboratory at Chorley.

Mr. Hurd: As I indicated in my reply to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Miss Maynard) on 20 February, it is not the practice to give details of the grounds for retirements such as Dr. Skuse's.

Commercial Vineyards (Sampling)

36. Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will consider introducing legislation to provide for special arrangements so that visitors can sample English wine when visiting the commercial vineyards in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Mellor: Vineyards holding a liquor licence may sell samples of wine during the permitted hours. We have no plans to introduce legislation to extend the permitted hours for vineyards specifically, but the Government support the case for relaxation in permitted hours generally, which would benefit vineyards. I cannot say when the necessary legislation might be introduced.

Police Officers

38. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total number of police officers at the most recent date for which figures are available.

Mr. Giles Shaw: There were 120,900 police officers in England and Wales on 31 May 1986.

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers were convicted of criminal offences in each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Statistics relating to the number of police officers in provincial forces convicted of criminal offences is contained in the annual reports of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary. Statistics for the Metropolitan police for the years 1979 onwards are contained in the annual reports of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis. The Metropolitan police statistics for earlier years are not available.

Roskill Report

39. Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received on the Roskill report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: I have received 33 letters and submissions from a variety of groups and individuals about the recommendations made by the fraud trials committee.

Neighbourhood Watch Schemes

42. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the effect of neighbourhood watch schemes on the crime figures for the last 12 months for which figures are available.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The full effects of neighbourhood watch schemes on national crime figures would be difficult to assess. However, where police forces have isolated crime figures for individual schemes, the results have indicated that neighbourhood watch can reduce local crime.

Community Radio Stations

43. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from applicants seeking a licence to run a community radio station about his decision not to proceed with this scheme.

Mr. Giles Shaw: As at 22 July we have received 21 letters of complaint from those who applied for experimental community radio licences.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many letters (a) of protest and (b) of approval he has received in respect of his announcement of the indefinite postponement of the community radio experiment.

Mr. Giles Shaw: As at 23 July we had received 39 letters of complaint and three of approval in respect of my right hon. Friend's decision that the community radio experiment should not take place.

Kidnap Insurance

45. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received on the issue of kidnap insurance.

Mr. Hurd: We have received a number of letters, including some from representatives of the insurance industry. I am still considering the issues involved.

Metropolitan Police District

47. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from Waltham Abbey, and elsewhere in Essex, about changing the boundary of the Metropolitan police district; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We have received no such representations.

Crime Clear-up Rates

48. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information is available to his Department about the proportion of crimes cleared up as the result of information volunteered to the police by members of the public.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information requested is not regularly collected centrally. However, the hon. Member may be interested in the results of a recent study of a small sample of burglaries, published in "Investigating burglary: the measurement of police performance" (Home Office Research Study No. 88), which showed that about a half of the offences cleared up were cleared up entirely or substantially as a result of information or other assistance (for example, physically detaining the suspect) provided by the public.

Drug Abuse (Merseyside)

49. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions have taken place between his Department and the Merseyside police authority in respect of the problem of drug abuse on Merseyside; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: None.

Trespass

50. Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to seek to amend the law of trespass in relation to publicly owned land.

Mr. Mellor: The consideration which we are giving to protection from trespassers extends to land occupied or managed by public bodies as well as individuals.

Peacock Committee

54. Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received on the report of the Peacock committee into the financing of the BBC.

69. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received following the publication of the Peacock report.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer the hon. Members to the reply given today to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson).

News International Dispute

55. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is now the total number of arrests at Wapping in connection with the print workers' dispute.

Mr. Giles Shaw: 1,098 up to today.

Mr. Shore asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis first gave directions under section 52 of the Metropolitan Police Act 1839, enabling the police to restrict pedestrian and vehicular traffic in the whole of the London borough of Tower Hamlets in connection with the industrial dispute at the News International plant in Wapping; and whether these directions are still in force;

(2) what consultations the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis had with Tower Hamlets borough council and with his Department before making directions under section 52 of the Metropolitan Police Act 1839;

(3) on what basis the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis determined that his directions under section 52 of the Metropolitan Police Act 1839 should cover the entire borough of Tower Hamlets;

(4) how many people have been, or are being, prosecuted for failing to comply with the Commissioner's directions relating to Tower Hamlets under the Metropolitan Police Act 1839;

(5) how many of the people arrested for failing to comply with the Commissioner's directions relating to Tower Hamlets under the Metropolitan Police Act 1839 are normally resident in the London borough of Tower Hamlets.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner that directions under section 52 of the 1839 Act in connection with this dispute continue to apply. Directions were first issued on 22 January. The giving of such directions is entirely a matter for the Commissioner, and he does not require my right hon. Friend's consent or that of the borough council. The Commissioner informs me that it is necessary to include all streets in the borough in order to facilitate the policing of demonstrations held at Wapping both near and at some distance from the News International plant. Failure to comply with the Commissioner's directions, which are issued to police officers, is not in itself a criminal offence, though a refusal to comply with police instructions issued in pursuance of the directions could, in certain circumstances, constitute an offence. Information about any arrests or prosecutions in connection with such offences is not readily available.

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary State for the Home Department if he will, further to his answer of 10 July, Official Report, column 225, update to the latest date for which figures are available the figures on the cost of police action at Wapping, the number of officers deployed and the police man hours spent.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Risley Remand Centre

56. Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many female prisoners were detained on remand at Risley remand centre on 1 July 1983, 1984, 1985 and 1986, respectively; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The readily available information is given in the table.

Female remand population of Risley remand centre
Number of prisoners

	Untried	Convicted unsentenced	Total
30 June 1983	52	22	74
30 June 1984	70	26	96
30 June 1985	80	27	107
30 June 1986*	86	20	106

* Provisional figures.

Air Weapons

57. Mr. Sydney Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further initiatives he intends to discourage the misuse of air weapons.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I intend to mount further campaigns in those areas in which the highest number of air weapons offences have been recorded.

Mr. John Stalker

58. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has about the progress of the inquiry into the conduct of Mr. John Stalker as deputy chief constable of Greater Manchester.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has yet received any information as to whether the inquiry into the conduct of Mr. John Stalker, deputy chief constable of Greater Manchester, has been concluded; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: This is a matter for the Greater Manchester police authority, which has appointed the chief constable of West Yorkshire to conduct the investigation; he is acting under the supervision of the Police Complaints Authority.

Metropolitan Police (Strategy Report)

60. Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what matters he discussed with the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis before the latter presented his strategy report for 1986.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The matters covered when my right hon. Friend and I met the Commissioner to discuss his draft strategy report included the force goal, resources, racial attacks, ethnic minority recruitment, community/police consultative arrangements, drugs and public order.

Jury Age Limit

62. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to seek to increase the jury age limit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: The present upper age limit for jury service is 65. The White Paper on plans for criminal justice legislation (Cmnd. 9658) invited comments on a proposal that those between 65 and 70 years of age should in future be eligible for jury service but excusable on request. The proposal has been well received. It would give older people an opportunity to participate in an important form of service to the community, while widening the pool from whom jurors are drawn. We have therefore decided to take an early opportunity to bring forward legislation to effect the change.

Airborne Radiation

64. Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what equipment he proposes to issue to local authorities to measure levels of radiation in the air.

68. Mr. Aspinwall asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what British-made radiation detection equipment is available for issue to local authorities for measuring levels of radiation in the air.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Local authorities are being issued with the British-made portable dose rate meter (PDRM) 82.

67. Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how, in the light of the Chernobyl disaster, he proposes to ensure that levels of radiation in the air can be monitored at local level.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Monitoring arrangements will be included in the Government's review of emergency procedures following the Chernobyl disaster.

Prison Officers Association

65. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will make a statement on his most recent discussions with representatives of the Prison Officers Association.

Mr. Mellor: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) on 18 June at columns 541-42. The NEC of the Prison Officers Association announced on 15 July that the members of the association had balloted by a majority of over 5:1 to call off their national industrial action. The way is therefore clear for the start of substantive discussions on the agenda for the future of the service set out in my right hon. Friend's letter of 22 April to the POA general secretary, on which he hopes to announce his proposals shortly.

Greater Manchester (Chief Constable)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met the chief constable of Greater Manchester; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Hurd: Mr. Anderton was one of six chief constables to whom I gave dinner on 16 June. Discussions with the group included a number of matters affecting the police in England and Wales.

Motoring Offences

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many convictions there were for motoring offences in each of the past five years in the United Kingdom;

(2) what has been the number of convictions for dangerous driving offences in the United Kingdom in each of the last five years.

Mr. Mellor: The latest available information on findings of guilt for motoring offences, by type of offence, is published in table 5 of Home Office Statistical Bulletin 28/85 "Offences Relating to Motor Vehicles, England and Wales". In 1984, there were about 5,000 findings of guilt for offences of dangerous or reckless driving and nearly 2 million findings of guilt for [illegible]otoring offences.

Prisoners (Statistics)

Mr. Kilroy Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number and proportion of prisoners from different ethnic groups received into custody between July 1984 and March 1985, broken down by sex and by different offence group, who had (a) no previous convictions, (b) one or two previous convictions and (c) three or more previous convictions.

Mr. Mellor: The information available for males is given in the table. It should be noted that for many categories this information is to a substantial extent incomplete and where the numbers involved are small the figures may be subject to wide variation. The numbers of females involved are too small to provide satisfactory figures, as may be seen from table 9 of the Home Office Statistical Bulletin 17/86.

* Excluding fine defaulters
† As published in Table 8 of Home Office Statistical Bulletin 17/86

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number and proportion of prisoners from different ethnic groups in prison on 30 June 1985, broken down by sex and by different offence groups, who had (a) no previous convictions, (b) one or two previous convictions and (c) three or more previous convictions.

Mr. Mellor: Analyses of the prison population on 30 June 1985 by ethnic origin and type of offence are currently being prepared for inclusion in "Prison Statistics, England and Wales, 1985". On publication, my noble Friend will write to the hon. Member giving the additional information requested.

Asylum

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for asylum were (a) received and (b) granted in 1985 and the first six months of 1986.

Mr. Waddington: The information requested is as follows. Annual figures were published in Home Office Statistical Bulletin 12/86 "Refugee Statistics, United Kingdom, 1985"; figures for the first quarter of 1986 are provisional and figures for the second quarter of 1986 are not yet available. Decisions made in a particular period do not necessarily relate to applications received in that period.

Citizenship

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the estimated waiting time for those applying now for (a) registration with entitlement and (b) naturalisation; and for how long those granted citizenship in 1986 in those two categories have been waiting.

Mr. Waddington: The average time taken to deal with these applications for registration from adults, mostly on the basis of entitlement, which were completed in June 1986 was four months, and for naturalisations it was 14 months. This is an improvement on the situation in December 1985 when the comparable figures were seven months and 20 months, respectively. It is not possible to give a reliable forecast of how long it will take to deal with citizenship applications which are now being received.

Mr. Peter Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to make available information about the ending of entitlements to registration as British citizens under the British Nationality Act 1981.

Mr. Hurd: The Government have taken opportunities to inform community organisations and others about the provisons for those who have a right to register as British citizens, for which applications have to be made by 31 December 1987. I am today publishing a free information leaflet entitled "Your Right to British Citizenship" which describes as clearly as possible those who have the right to British citizenship under these provisions and answers the principal questions which applicants are likely to ask. The leaflet makes clear that there is no obligation to apply and that people may still apply for naturalisation at any time. The leaflet is today available from the nationality division of the Home Office and is being sent to community relations councils, citizens advice bureaux and other organisations so that they can give them to inquirers. The same bodies will also receive a poster designed to draw people's attention to the leaflet. I am placing copies of the leaflet in the Library. I hope this information will help people who have the right to register as British citizens to decide in good time whether they wish to do so.

Overseas Visitors

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many passengers by nationality were refused leave to enter in each month since January 1985; and what percentage of passenger traffic from these countries these figures represent.

Mr. Waddington: The available information relates to passengers removed from the United Kingdom after having been refused leave to enter. The table gives the figures by nationality for the first three months of 1985. Figures for subsequent months were given in the reply to a question from the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) on 11 July 1986 at column 284.

Total admission figures for 1985 by nationality, but excluding European Community countries, were published in table 1 of "Control of Immigration: Statistics, United Kingdom 1985" (Cmnd. 9863).

Chilean Nationals (Asylum)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for asylum have been received from Chilean nationals per month since November 1984.

Mr. Waddington: The information requested is as follows:

Month	Number of applications
1984
November	1
December	1
1985
February	1
May	4
July	1
August	1
October	1

The figures do not include dependants. No application has been received from Chilean nationals between the end of October 1985 and March 1986, the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Dharminder Singh

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why Mr. Dharminder Singh, a passenger arriving on flight M5777 at terminal 3, Heathrow airport on 13 July, was detained for four hours by immigration officials; why his passport, address book and a wedding invitation were removed from him; why they have not yet been returned to him; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: Mr. Dharminder Singh arrived at the immigration control at approximately 1300 hours on 13 July and sought admission as a visitor. At 1310 hours he was required by an immigration officer to submit to further examination under the Immigration Act 1971. This continued until 1645 hours when he was granted temporary admission until 1430 hours on 29 July so that further inquiries could be made. Mr. Singh's documents have been retained by the immigration officer pending the completion of his examination and the grant or refusal of leave to enter.

Prisons (Education Equipment)

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what rules govern the provision of educational equipment to the inmates of Her Majesty's prisons.

Mr. Mellor: The learning needs of inmates are determined by the education officer at each establishment after interviews with the inmates and in consultation with the teaching staff. Subject to the requirements of security and control and the availability of resources, educational equipment is provided to meet these needs.

Prisoners (Literacy)

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the inmates of Her Majesty's prisons can neither read nor write; and what facilities are provided to enable them to communicate with their friends and relatives.

Mr. Mellor: Information on the number of prisoners who can neither read nor write is not available. But of 62,963 inmates tested in 1984-85, 19 per cent. had a reading age of less than 12 years and 5·8 per cent a reading age of less than eight years. Prisoners who have difficulty in reading or writing are encouraged to attend classes to improve these and other basic skills. Assistance in reading and writing letters is available from education and other prison staff.

Mr. and Mrs. Tariq Mahmood

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when he expects to be able to reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Stockton, South dated 28 May concerning Mr. and Mrs. Tariq Mahmood of 16 Westbourne street, Stockton-on-Tees;

(2) how long he has been considering the case of Mr. and Mrs. Tariq Mahmood of 16 Westbourne street, Stockton-on-Tees; when he expects to make a decision; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: The hon. Member first wrote to me on 20 March 1986. I have now considered his representations and written to him today giving my decision on them.

Mr. Majid Hadjarpour

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how long he has been considering the case of Mr. Majid Hadjarpour of 21 Whitwell close, Stockton-on-Tees; when he expects to make a decision; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: An application was made on behalf of Mr. Hadjarpour in May 1985 and after certain inquiries had been made he was interviewed on 19 February 1986. A decision on the application is expected shortly.

Prisons (Drugs)

Sir Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will instigate an inquiry into the availability of drugs in the prisons;

(2) what arrangements there are to prevent drugs from being smuggled into prisons; how many cases there have been over each of the past five years of prisoners' visitors being found to be engaged in such activities; and how many prosecutions there have been for such offences.

Mr. Hurd: Because it is so important to keep illegal drugs out of prisons we are consistently reviewing and seeking to improve the means of doing so. Regular and special searches are conducted, including the use of dogs specially trained in drug detection work. The number of trained dogs has been increased. The quality of the information available centrally about the incidence of drugs in prisons has been improved. Staff training on drugs has been improved. A new training package aimed specifically at the problems and needs of the prison service was issued to all establishments last year. Further instructions, which pay particular attention to the prevention of smuggling, will soon be issued. The normal procedure is to refer to the police a case in which a visitor is found to be engaged in smuggling, or in which there is reason to believe that a visitor intends to smuggle drugs into an establishment. Information is not at present available centrally about the numbers or the outcome of such cases. If I thought that a general inquiry into the subject would help to improve our procedures further I would set one up, but that is not my judgment at present.

Sir Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what evidence he has of cocaine and heroin being smuggled into Highpoint prison in Suffolk.

Mr. Mellor: Highpoint's records show that, since 1 January 1983, heroin has been discovered there on two occasions — once in 1983 and once this year — and cocaine on no occasion. Police and internal inquiries are being conducted into recent allegations regarding the smuggling and abuse of drugs at this establishment.

Acklington Prison (Construction Work)

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why roofs and floorboards were removed by contractors from two officers' quarters at Her Majesty's prison, Acklington, which were not scheduled for demolition; whether the properties will be made good; and what charge on public funds will arise from this action.

Mr. Mellor: The two quarters had been scheduled for demolition. The demolition contractor had sublet part of the work to a local firm which was salvaging materials. There was a misunderstanding by prison staff about the firm's right to remove the materials, but this was later resolved. No charge on public funds will arise from this incident, and demolition of the quarters will be completed later this year.

Visas

Mr. Terry Fields asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to extend the scope of the requirement for visitors from abroad to possess visas to enter the United Kingdom; if he will list those countries from which an entry visa is currently required; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: The appendix to the immigration rules (HC 169 as amended) specifies the overseas nationals who need visas for the United Kingdom. All immigration control arrangements, including the extent of visa requirements, are kept under continuous re-examination in the light of changing patterns of travel and traffic.

Job Applicants (Police Records)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department who is to decide whether a criminal record of a prospective employee who aims to work with children is relevant to the public sector job in question; whether the information passed will include details of any crime committed by that prospective employee; and what criteria are used to weed the information disclosed.

Mr. Mellor: One senior officer in each relevant local authority department will be responsible for requesting checks from the police and deciding the relevance of convictions to the appointment in question. The information supplied by the police will include, in addition to the full record of convictions, details of any recorded cautions or bind over orders, and, where readily accessible, cases recorded or detected where no proceedings were taken. The information disclosable will be weeded in accordance with the established criteria for weeding police records.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with the Data Protection Registrar in relation to the order that gives local authorities access to police records of prospective employees who will work with children; whether that access will include data from criminal intelligence files of police forces; and if he will seek to ensure that police forces keep separate and complete records of the disclosure of information to the local authority.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The registration of police computer systems in accordance with the Data Protection Act is in a form which covers the disclosure of the police records of those seeking employment involving substantial access to children. The information supplied by the police will show details of convictions, recorded cautions, bind over orders, and, where readily accessible, cases recorded as detected where no proceedings were taken. It is for chief officers of police to make any arrangements they consider appropriate for the keeping of records of the disclosure of information in these circumstances.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if it is envisaged that a prospective employee who works with children will be told when the reason why he was not employed was the existence of a criminal record; and what appeals procedure he is establishing to resolve conflicts.

Mr. Mellor: Criminal record checks will be made only at the point when an applicant has otherwise been found acceptable for the post in question. Where convictions are revealed that have not been disclosed by the applicant, the senior nominated officer in the employing authority will be required to take up the discrepancy with the applicant and resolve any disagreement. The decision on employment will therefore be taken in the light of an agreed record.

Child Carers (Criminal Records)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the general categories of crimes that make individuals unsuitable to work with children; and how many entries there are in the criminal names index of the police national computer that fall within those categories.

Mr. Giles Shaw: It is for the employing authority to make a judgment as to the suitability of the applicant taking into account only those offences which may be relevant to the particular job or situation in question. In deciding the relevance of convictions a number of points will be considered, including the nature of the appointment and the nature, time and frequency of the offence. With reference to the number of entries in the criminal names index of the police national computer, I refer the hon. Member for the reply given to his question on 9 July 1986, at column 182, as subsequently corrected.

Child Abusers (Therapy)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to promote new forms of therapy for child abusers, as an alternative to prison sentences; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Those who have been convicted of serious offences of child abuse are properly sentenced to imprisonment. Therapy may be made available but not as part of a sentence by the courts.

Immigration Services (Interpreting Facilities)

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made in the review of interpreting facilities throughout the immigration services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: The first stage of the review which is of the facilities available to the immigration service and their cost, is approaching completion. The second stage will then consider the options available for enhancement of the facilities and for securing the best possible return from expenditure in a way that meets the needs of the service and reduces inconvenience to passengers.

Prisons (Reclassification)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Deartment what is the current possition with regard to the reclassification of prisons in the Yorkshire and Humberside area.

Mr. Mellor: On 24 February 1986 Hull, previously a training prison, became a local prison and Thorp Arch, previously a remand centre, became a training prison.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what effect the reclassification of prisons in the Yorkshire and Humberside area has had on the population of Leeds prison; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The average population of Leeds prison between January 1985 and February 1986 was nearly 1,300. Between March 1986 and May 1986 (the latest date for which figures are available) the average population was 1,175.

Child Abuse (Voluntary Groups)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what support he is giving to voluntary groups working with the victims and offenders of child abuse; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The Home Office makes grants to a number of voluntary organisations offering a wide range of rehabilitative projects for offenders of all kinds, and provides funding both for local victims support schemes and their national association. Funding is also provided by the Department of Health and Social Security to a range of voluntary organisations in the child care field.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of crimes reported in the following categories for (a) Merseyside, (b) Greater Manchester, (c) Lancashire, (d) Cheshire and (e) Cumbria, separately, and for each year since 1979: (i) theft, (ii) burglary, (iii) vandalism, (iv) rape and (v) drug offences; and how many of the crimes in each category were cleared up.

Mr. Mellor: Statistics of notifiable offences recorded by the police for the offence groups theft and handling stolen goods, burglary and criminal damage are published annually, by police force area, in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales" (table 2.5 of the volume for 1984, Cmnd 9621) and most recently in table 6 of Home Office Statistical Bulletin 4/86. I shall write to the hon. Member regarding the other information requested.

Police (Complaints)

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from chief constables in England and Wales to establish the number of police officers and civil staff engaged full-time on the investigation of complaints against the police in 1985, and the cost of such investigations, in a form comparable to the figures quoted on page 85 of the 1985 Report of the Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No.

Research Councils

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will make a statement on the measures which he is taking to resolve the problems relating to the designation of research councils under section 2(3) of the British Nationality Act 1981, and Statutory Instrument 1766 of 1984; and whether he will ensure that these difficulties receive early discussion through the departmental Whitley machinery.

Mr. Waddington: Home Office officials are in close touch with officials in the Department of Education and Science, which is responsible for the research councils which have been designated under section 2(3) of the British Nationality Act 1981, to identify the detailed terms under which persons may be in service under these councils. We shall then consider whether any change should be made to the designation order. I understand discussions will continue between the research councils and the relevant staff associations. I hope this matter can be resolved as soon as possible.

Juvenile Courts (School Reports)

Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the disclosure of school reports in the juvenile court in the light of proposals made by a NACRO working group report in "Schools Reports in the Juvenile Court."

Mr. Hurd: The working group report recommended that the contents of school reports submitted to juvenile courts to assist with sentencing decisions should be disclosed in full to both the juvenile and his parents.

After considering the comments of a wide range of interested bodies, I have concluded that young people should be aware of information which might influence the court's decision, so they have an opportunity to challenge any allegations which the reports may contain. On the other hand, full disclosure might well be harmful to the young person in some instances.

I have therefore decided that the juvenile court rules should be amended to make it clear that the disclosure provisions should apply to school reports as to others. Reports should be fully disclosed to the parents and to the child's legal representative. Reports should normally be disclosed to the juvenile, unless the court directs otherwise on the grounds of the serious harm which might be caused to the juvenile or the likelihood that the report would be beyond his or her ability to understand. These changes will be included in the next revision of the Magistrates' Courts (Children and Young Persons) Rules 1970.

Passport Fees

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans to increase passport fees this financial year.

Mr. Hurd: I have no plans to increase passport fees this financial year. These fees, which have been at their present levels since November 1983, are designed to cover the cost of providing passport facilities in the United Kingdom and at Foreign and Commonwealth Office consular posts overseas, and also the costs of those consular services for which fees are not charged. The latest projected costings indicate that full cost recovery will be achieved this financial year on the basis of current fee levels.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the average weekly flying hours of Metropolitan police helicopters on traffic patrol duties during the past year.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1986, c. 338]: The Commissioner of police of the Metropolis tells me that from 1 July 1985 to 30 June 1986, the Metropolitan police helicopters flew an average of about five hours a week specifically on traffic patrol duties.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department for each of the past five years what was the number of write-offs obtained by Metropolitan police officers from confessions by prisoners serving sentences for other unrelated offences.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 16 July 1986, c. 509]: I understand from the Commissioner of police of the Metropolis that an experimental scheme of interviewing prisoners about otherwise unsolved crimes was introduced force-wide in April 1984 following an earlier pilot scheme in two divisions. Offences cleared up through this scheme have not been separately identified for the regular returns on offences cleared up, but a separate evaluation, which may not be entirely consistent with those returns, suggests that in the period April to December 1984 the number of offences cleared up through the scheme was less than 3,000 and in 1985 less than 5,000. The latter figure represents some 3 to 4 per cent. of all offences cleared up by the Metropolitan police in 1985. It is planned to identify separately offences cleared up in this way in the regular returns for 1987, following the introduction by the Home Office of more detailed returns on the ways in which offences are cleared up.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Minoxidil

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what side effects have been reported to the Committee on Safety of Medicines in respect of Minoxidil; when it was approved for prescription-only use; if he has any plans to permit its sale without prescription; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: There have been 46 reports of suspected adverse drug reactions associated with Minoxidil received by the Committee on Safety of Medicines and these are set out in the table. It should be noted that, such a report does not necessarily indicate a causal relationship between a product and the reported reaction, and considerable caution should be exercised in interpreting these numbers in the absence of data on the prescription volume and other relevant factors.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Jackson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will add to the limited list branded drugs which are available at the same price as the generic equivalent on the selected list.

Mr. Hayhoe: No. A recent High Court judgment found that the policy of prescribing, wherever possible, by generic name within the selected list scheme meets the relevant legal requirements. I intend therefore to continue with this policy.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the ceiling on the rent which a landlord may charge where the rent is being paid via housing benefit.

Mr. Major: The regulations do not specify a maximum allowable rent for housing benefit purposes, but if a rent is registered housing benefit is payable only on the registered rent. However, local authorities can in certain circumstances limit the amount of rent which is taken into account in calculating entitlement to housing benefit if they consider that the rent charged is unreasonable. We propose to strengthen local authorities' powers to withhold benefit and that the Secretary of State should have a reserve power to limit the level of rent eligible for housing benefit.

NHS (Administrative Staff)

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing, for each year since 1979, the number of administrative staff in the National Health Service.

Mr. Whitney: The figures are shown in the table.

Supplementary Benefit

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much was spent on supplementary benefit additional requirements in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Newton: Some £500 million.
Source: Annual Statistical Enquiry. December 1984 (provisional)

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much was spent on supplementary benefit paid on grounds of sickness or disability in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Newton: In the financial year 1984-85, the latest year for which the information is available, the expenditure is estimated to have been approximately £325 million.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people at the latest date for which information is available were receiving supplementary benefit because they were sick or disabled (i) with contributory benefit and (ii) without contributory benefit.

Mr. Newton: The information is as follows:

	Number of claimants (thousands)
With contributory benefit	98
Without contributory benefit	175

Source: Annual Statistical Enquiry: December 1984 (provisional)

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people at the latest date for which information is available were receiving supplementary benefit over pension age (i) with retirement pension and (ii) without retirement pension.

Mr. Newton: As many recipients of widows pension have an underlying entitlement to retirement pension, information is given in the table of numbers of supplementary pensioners with retirement pension, those with widows pension, and those without either pension.

	Numbers of supplementary pensioners (thousands)
(a) With retirement pension	1,521
(b) With widows pension	8
(c) Without either retirement or widows pension	100

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people at the latest date for which information is available were receiving supplementary benefit additional requirements for (i) disabled persons heating addition, (ii) laundry, (iii) diet, (iv) wear and tear on clothing, (v) special clothing, (vi) baths, (vii) blindness, (viii) domestic assistance, (ix) over 80 age addition, (x) attendance costs and (xi) hospital fares.

Mr. Newton: The information is as follows:

	Additional requirement	Number of claimants (Thousands)
(i)	Disabled persons heating addition	136
(ii)	Laundry	185
(iii)	Diet	489
(iv)	Wear and tear on clothing	35

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many people claimed supplementary benefit at his Department's local office in Princess drive, Liverpool, in each of the years 1979 to 1985, inclusive; and what percentage change each represents;

(2) what was the percentage change in (a) staff handling supplementary benefit and (b) all staff at his Department's local office in Princess drive, Liverpool, between 1979 and 1985;

(3) how many people claimed supplementary benefit at his Department's local office in Parthenon drive, Liverpool, in each of the years 1979 to 1985 inclusive; and what percentage change each represents;

(4) what was the percentage change in (a) staff handling supplementary benefit and (b) all staff at his Department's local office in Parthenon drive, Liverpool, between 1979 and 1985.

Mr. Major: Comprehensive figures are not available before 1982-83 and information on the number of individuals who claimed supplementary benefit is not available in the form requested.

Information that is available is as follows:

	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86	Total

Percentages represent changes over the previous year but those in brackets represent the percentage change 1982-83 to 1985-86.

The percentage change in complement 1982-83 to 1985-86 is as follows:

	Supplementary benefit staff per cent.

Parthenon Drive	+1·7

Both offices deal only with supplementary benefit so the change in all staff will be the same as above.

Direct comparisons between numbers of staff and claims are misleading as work loads vary considerably by type and duration of claim and the action that has to be taken. All these factors vary over time as a result of legislative, policy and procedural changes. Examples of such changes are the introduction of housing benefit and postal claim forms.

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many people claimed supplementary benefit in the Liverpool, West Derby, constituency in (a) 1979 and (b) 1985; and what percentage change that represents;

Mr. Major: Liverpool, West Derby is covered by four of the Department's offices, Norris Green, Huyton and the two offices at West Derby. Their boundaries are not conterminous with the boundary of the constituency. One of the West Derby offices is a national insurance office and does not deal with supplementary benefit.

Direct comparisons between numbers of staff and claims are misleading as work loads vary considerably by type and duration of claim and the action that has to be taken. All these factors vary over time as a result of legislative, policy and procedural changes. Examples of such changes are the introduction of Housing Benefit and postal claim forms.

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assessment he has made of the period of time it takes to deal with new claims for supplementary benefit, additional supplementary benefit and single payments made as a result of the Cleveland county council benefits take-up campaign; if he can indicate what is the average time delay for each office in Middlesbrough, Stockton, Hartlepool, Redcar and Eston; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: This information is not available. These claims are treated no differently from any others, urgent claims being given priority. I refer the hon. Member to my reply to his previous question on 21 July at columns 104-106.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the percentage change in (a) staff handling supplementary benefit and (b) all staff at the local offices of his Department in Leyton and Leytonstone between 1979 and 1985.

Mr. Major: Leyton and Leytonstone are covered by two of the Department's offices, Leytonstone and Walthamstow, but their boundaries are not conterminous with the boundary of the area.

Leytonstone	+20·9	− 3·4

Staffing levels reflect overall changes in work loads brought about as a result of legislative, policy and procedural changes. Examples of such changes are the introduction of housing benefit and postal claim forms.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the value of the supplementary benefit scale rates excluding housing costs, for a couple with two children, one aged under five years, the other five to 10 years as a proportion of net male earnings for November 1985 and July 1986 using an estimate for the latter on the same basis as his reply of 29 October 1985 to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) Official Report, column 446.

Mr. Major: The provisional figure for November 1985 is 45·1 per cent. It is not yet possible to make any estimate for July 1986.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a table showing the value of the long-term supplementary benefit scale rates, excluding housing costs, for a single person and a married couple as a proportion of average net adult earnings for each year from November 1979 to July 1986, using an estimate for the latter figure.

Mr. Major: The information requested is as follows:

Date	Long-term scale rates as percentage of average net adult earnings
	Single householder	Couple
November 1979	29·7	45·0
November 1980	29·1	44·4

November 1983	29·5	45·0
November 1984	28·4	43·1
November 1985	27·9	42·3

Notes:
1. The figures for 1985 are provisional.
2. It is not yet possible to provide estimates for July 1986.
3. Net average weekly earnings are the estimates of gross weekly full-time earnings of adult males (aged 21 and over up to November 1982 and from November 1983 all males on adult rates) whose earnings are not affected by absence, less tax and national insurance contributions at the non-contracted out rate plus child benefit (which is off-set against the supplementary benefit scale rates).

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the numbers of recipients of supplementary benefit and the numbers dependent on them in 1984, broken down into the following categories (a) retirement pensioners, (b) unemployed, (c) sick and disabled, (d) national insurance widows, with and without children, and (e) lone parents.

Mr. Major: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Direct comparisons between numbers of staff and claims are misleading as work loads vary considerably by type and duration of claim and the action that has to be taken. All these factors vary over time as a result of legislative, policy and procedural changes. Examples of such changes are the introduction of Housing Benefit and postal claim forms.

Direct comparisons between numbers of staff and claims are misleading as work loads vary considerably by type and duration of claim and the action that has to be taken. All these factors vary over time as a result of legislative, policy and procedural changes. Examples of such changes are the introduction of housing benefit and postal claim forms.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people claimed supplementary benefit in the Coventry, North-West constituency in (a) 1979 and (b) 1985; what percentage change that represents; and what was the percentage change in (i) staff handling supplementary benefit and (ii) all staff at the local offices of his Department over the same period.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 18 July 1986, c. 662]: Coventry, North-West is covered by two of the Department's offices, Coventry, West and Coventry, East, but their boundaries are not conterminous with the boundary of the constituency.

Comprehensive figures are not available before 1980-81 and information on the number of individuals who claimed supplementary benefit is not available in the form requested.

Mr. John Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people claimed benefit in the Monklands, East constituency in (a) 1979 and (b) 1985; what percentage change that represents; and what was the percentage change in (i) staff handling supplementary benefit and (11) all staff at the local offices of his Department over the same period.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 21 July 1986, c. 88]: Monklands, East is covered by four of the Department's offices, Aidrie, Coatbridge area office, Coatbridge national insurance office and Shotts NIO. Benefits

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much was spent on (i) weekly disablement pensions under the industrial injuries scheme, (ii) special hardship allowance and (iii) other additions to industrial injuries benefit in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Newton: Information is not available in the form requested. Expenditure for the year ended 5 April 1986 was as follows:

Disablement benefit (including special hardship allowance)	405,907
Other additions to disablement benefit	4,900
	410,807

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people at the latest date for which information is available were receiving industrial injury disablement pension (i) at 20 per cent. or less, (ii) at 30 per cent., (iii) at 40 per cent. (iv) at 50 to 90 per cent., (v) at 100 per cent., (vi) special hardship allowance, (vii) constant attendance allowance, (viii) unemployability supplement, (ix) exceptionally severe disablement allowance and (x) hospital treatment allowance.

Mr. Newton: Figures for the year ending 30 September 1983 (the latest for which information is available) are as follows:

	Beneficiaries
Disablement pension
20 per cent. and below	90,980
30 per cent.	45,570
40 per cent.	21,950
50 to 90 per cent.	23,960
100 per cent.	3,660
Special hardship allowance	144,770
Constant attendance allowance	2,170
Exceptionally severe disablement allowance	710
Unemployability supplement	270
Hospital treatment allowance	50

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the cost of increasing the single person's rate of each of the following benefits by £7·35 (i) invalid care allowance, (ii) invalidity pension, (iii) severe disablement allowance, (iv) statutory sick pay and (v) unemployment benefit.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1986, c. 418]: The estimated gross cost in a full year of increasing the personal rates of the following benefits by £7·35 a week is*:

	£ million
Invalid care allowance	30
Invalidity pension	350
Severe disablement allowance	95
Statutory sick pay	†110
Unemployment benefit	335

* The gross costs would be offset to some extent by savings on supplementary benefit and housing benefit: these could be estimated only at disproportionate expense.

† Statutory sick pay is paid by employers, who recover the cost from contributions payable to the National Insurance Fund. The figure of £110 million is the estimated net reduction in National Insurance Fund income.

Organ Donors

Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from doctors about the Chief Medical Officer's proposed voluntary code of practice relating to potential organ donors.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, pursuant to the answer of 11 July, he is now in a position to make an announcement on the introduction of a voluntary code of practice on procuring relatives' permission for the removal of organs for transplantation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: The Chief Medical Officer wrote to the medical profession's representative bodies asking for their views on introducing a voluntary code of practice under which doctors would agree to ensure that, whenever a patient died who was clinically suitable as an organ donor, the relatives were asked for permission for the organs to be removed. He has now received replies which are on the whole positive, though some reservations were expressed. The Chief Medical Officer's intention is that a working party be set up to take the matter forward.

AIDS

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has yet decided to finance a television advertising campaign warning of the risks involved in contracting acquired immune deficiency syndrome; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: The possible use of television and its cost effectiveness and suitability in future stages of the AIDS information campaign remains under consideration.

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to be able to announce his decision in response to the application from the United Kingdom Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome Foundation for additional support from his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: The United Kindom AIDS Foundation has written to my Department requesting additional support and a reply will be sent very shortly.

Attendance Allowance

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many reviews of attendance allowance during the currency of an award in 1984 and 1985, nationally and in each of the social security regions, were instituted (a) by the Secretary of State and (b) by the claimant: what, in each case, was the number and proportion in which (i) the allowance was withdrawn, (ii) the existing award was retained, (iii) the higher rate decreased to the lower rate and (iv) the lower rate increased to the higher rate; and what was the breakdown of these reviews into (y) ones because of dissatisfaction with an earlier decision and (z) ones because of a change in the need for attention or supervision.

Mr. Newton: For information relating to 1984 I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) on 26 March 1985 at columns 174-76. The available information for 1985 is given in the following tables and relates to decisions given, not to applications made in that year.

Claimants

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will provide an estimate of the number of social security and housing benefit claimants who would cease to be eligible for each category of housing benefit or social security if child benefit were to be increased to (a) £15 and (b) £20 per week.

Mr. Newton: I regret that the information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the number of claimants for each benefit administered by the Department of Health and Social Security in Wales;

(2) how many people are entitled to each of the benefit payments available through the Department of Health and Social Security in Wales; and what is the level of take-up.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 17 April 1986, c. 452]: The latest figures for people in receipt of various social security benefits in Wales are as follows, where figures are available.

Children (Clinical Research)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, pursuant to his answer of 23 June, Official Report, columns 65-6, consultations on whether to issue further guidance to health authorities on clinical research involving children have yet begun; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: I have nothing to add to my reply to the hon. Member on 23 June at columns 65-6.

Goods and Services (Contracts)

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has in respect of regional health authorities as to the total amount spent on the acquisition of goods and services, expressed in terms of the net contract prices; and how many individual contracts comprised that volume of purchasing for each of the last five years for which figures are available, giving both the overall totals for each regional health authority and the totals disaggregated into the following categories: (a) capital and revenue expenditure, (b) construction and non-construction projects, (c) goods and services purchased from United Kingdom-based companies and non-United Kingdom-based companies and (d) goods and services purchased from the private sector and from other parts of the public sector.

Mr. Whitney: The total spent currently on goods and services by National Health Service authorities in England amounts to approximately £2·5 billion a year. We do not keep a detailed analysis centrally of the other information requested.

Disabled Persons (Discrimination)

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many complaints claiming discrimination against disabled people he received in each year from 1980 to 1985, inclusive; and what his findings were and responses in each case.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

McColl Report

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now make a statement on the McColl report, taking into account the views put to his Department about its recommendations.

Mr. Newton: We have not yet completed our consideration, in the light of the responses we have received in consultation, of the issues raised in the McColl report; in particular, we think it right to take account also of the recently published report of the Royal College of Physicians on medical rehabilitation services generally.

DHSS Staff

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many staff in May 1979 were employed in each social security office, and how many are now in (a) west midlands offices, (b) the black country area of the west midlands and (c) the two Walsall offices; and if he will give in each case the percentage change.

Mr. Major: The black country area of the West Midlands is covered by the Department's offices at Dudley, North and Dudley, South, Smethwick, Walsall, East and Walsall, West, West Bromwich and Wolverhampton, North and Wolverhampton, South.

The complement of social security offices in (a) the west midlands, (b) the black country area of the west midlands and (c) the two Walsall offices in May 1979 and July 1986, and the percentage changes are as follows:

	1979	1986	Per cent. change
West Midlands*	5,559	6,000	+7·9
Black Country	1,236	1,479	+19·7
Walsall offices	299	333	+11·4

* West midlands region was merged with part of east midland and East Anglia region in 1982 to form the present midland region. For the sake of consistency, the table shows, for 1986, the total complement for those offices which were formerly part of West Midland region.

Staffing levels reflect the overall change in the work loads since 1979 brought about as a result of procedureal and legislative changes. Major examples of these changes are the introduction of statutory sick pay, Housing Benefit and postal claim forms for supplementary benefit.

Medical Boarding Centres

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will give for each year since 1975, and for each medical boarding centre, the number of awards based on disablement assessments of (a) 10 per cent., *(b)*20 per cent., (c) 30 per cent., (d) 40 per cent., (e) 50 per cent., (f) 60 per cent., (g) 70 per cent., (h) 80 per cent., (i) 90 per cent., (j) 100 per cent., respectively;

(2) if he will give for each prescribed disease and for each year since 1975 the number of applicants to special medical boards, the number of awards, the number of appeals, and the number of successful appeals;

(3) if he will give for each medical boarding centre for every year since 1975 the number of cases referred, the number of awards, the number of appeals heard, and the number of successful appeals.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations have been made to him regarding medical boarding centres.

Mr. Tony Newton: We occasionally receive representations about medical boarding centres from hon. Members, organisations and members of the public. In recent weeks we have received representations about medical boarding centres (respiratory diseases) from the General Municipal, Boilermakers and Allied Trades Union and the Society for the Prevention of Asbestosis and Industrial Diseases.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what regulations exist to ensure no conflicts of interest are experienced by members of, or advisers to, special medical boards.

Mr. Newton: Regulation 36(1) of the Social Security (Adjudication) Regulations 1984 provides that a person shall not act as a member of a special medical board in any case if he is or may be directly affected by that case. The same regulation also provides that a person shall not act as a board member if he has taken any part in a case as a medical assessor or as a medical practitioner who has regularly attended the claimant or to whom any question has been referred for report or as an employer or as a witness.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the names, qualifications and background of all the doctors employed by his Department at each medical boarding centre to examine applicants to special medical boards, including both full-time employees and part-time advisers or examiners.

Mr. Newton: The names and qualifications of all medical practitioners appointed to serve on special medical boards at each medical boarding centre (respiratory diseases) are given in the table. Details of their background and experience can be found in the current edition of the "Medical Directory", which is in the Library.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will place in the Library the findings of the medical appeals tribunals on all occasions since 1975 when they have upheld appeals against decisions of the special medical boards.

Mr. Newton: This is a matter for the president of the Medical Appeal Tribunals, his honour Judge Byrt QC, but I understand that because the findings of medical appeal tribunals are confidential to the parties to an appeal there can be no question of the general publication of such findings.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the cost of each medical boarding centre in every year since 1978-79.

Mr. Newton: I assume that the hon. Member is referring to medical boarding centres (respiratory diseases). The following table shows total costs of each centre for the financial year 1985-86, the only year for which information is available in the form requested. These are provisional figures.

Medical boarding centre	Cost £
Newcastle	205,800
Sheffield	371,200
Cardiff	399,700
Stoke	236,500
Glasgow	165,000
London	180,700
Swansea	186,600
Manchester	289,500

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the responsibilities of medical boarding centres.

Mr. Newton: I assume the hon. Member is referring to medical boarding centres (respiratory diseases). In addition to their medical boarding functions medical practitioners in these boarding centres provide reports on diagnosis and recrudescence questions referred by adjudication officers. They carry out initial and perodical examinations of workers in certain dusty occupations. They also advise adjudication officers about the cause of death in connection with claims for death benefit under the industrial injuries scheme and the pneumoconiosis, byssinosis and miscellaneous diseases benefit scheme.

Disablement Benefit

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the total number of recipients of (a) 10 per cent. (b) 20 per cent., (c) 30 per cent., (d) 40 per cent., (e) 50 per cent., (f) 60 per cent., (g) 70 per cent., (h) 80 per cent., (i) 90 per cent. and (j) 100 per industrial disablement benefit.

Mr. Newton: In the year ending 30 September 1983 (the latest for which information is available), the numbers receiving disablement pensions at the levels specified were as follows:

Per cent. Disablement	Beneficiaries
10	13,360
20	67,140
30	45,570

Per cent. Disablement	Beneficiaries
40	21,950
50	10,880
60	6,360
70	3,700
80	2,220
90	800
100	3,660

In addition about 14,000 lump sums are estimated to have been awarded for disablement assessed at 10 per cent.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the average length of time for which 100 per cent. of industrial disablement benefit is paid.

Mr. Newton: I regret that this information is not available.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will ensure that special training is provided for his Department's officers handling disablement claims.

Mr. Major: Yes. The Department's Local Office staff currently receive, at the workplace, technical training on industrial disablement claims. Plans are well laid to supplement this with job aids and trainer instructions for the forthcoming changes. This additional training will also be concluded in the local office and will be conducted in advance of the implementation date.

Pneumoconiosis

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give for each year since 1970 (a) the total number of claimants under the pneumoconiosis, byssinosis and miscellaneous diseases benefit scheme, (b) the number of awards, (c) the number of claimants who ask for a decision to be reconsidered and (d) the number of reconsiderations which have resulted in the reversal of a decision.

Mr. Newton: The following table shows the number of claimants and the number of awards under the pneumoconiosis, byssinosis and miscellaneous diseases benefit scheme since March 1982, the earliest date for which figures are available.

Year	Number of claimants	Number of awards
1982	52	21
1983	334	99
1984	311	120
1985	234	114
1986 (to 22 July 1986)	153	62

The information requested at (c) and (d) could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Meningitis Vaccine

Sir Anthony Kershaw asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects vaccines against meningitis to be available in the Stroud district.

Mr. Whitney: I am advised that it is likely to be at least a year before a vaccine against group B meningococcal meningitis (the form of the disease which has been most evident in Stroud), becomes available. Work to develop such a vaccine is being carried out at the United Kingdom Centre for Applied Microbiological Research and also, I understand, in the United States.

Mesothelioma

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in what proportion of deaths from mesothelioma industrial death benefit is paid by his Department.

Mr. Newton: In 1983, the latest year for which figures are available, industrial death benefit was awarded in approximately one-third of cases where mesothelioma was shown on the death certificate. Not all deaths where the death certificate mentions mesothelioma result in claims for industrial death benefit. In a number of cases, for example, the deceased may not have left a widow.

Doctors (Diagnostic Services)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all the bodies for which, and the circumstances in which, doctors employed by his Department diagnose individuals' complaints.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Inglehurst Nursing Home, Blackpool

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the report of his inquiry into the Inglehurst nursing home in Blackpool.

Mr. Whitney: It is unclear to which inquiry the hon. Member refers. There have been three inquiries which relate to Inglehurst nursing home. That by the Health Service Commissioner has recently been issued to the parties concerned and to the North-Western regional health authority (the next highest authority). This is in accordance with the National Health Service Act 1977. The other reports were by Blackpool, Wyre and Fylde health authority and by the regional health authority.

Pharmacists

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the benefits to patients from the new contract for retail pharmacists.

Mr. Hayhoe: The new contract for retail pharmacists is intended to ensure that the National Health Service obtains and pays for only those pharmaceutical services which the National Health Service and its patients need. Family practitioner committees will, in future, decide whether the needs of patients justify the expenditure on a new NHS contract and will refuse an application if this is not the case. The only judgment will be one of patient need. This new arrangement will ensure that there is a reasonable but not excessive supply of pharmacies with National Health Service contracts and will make progress towards a better distribution of patient services.

In addition:

there will be an increased level of financial support to essential small pharmacies which provide valuable services to patients in sparsely populated areas.

Pharmacies will be encouraged to be more cost-effective and efficient through changes in the pattern of remuneration. A more efficient service will, of course, benefit patients.

Alterations to the system of cost collection will produce savings to the taxpayer which will be "shared" equally between the profession and the Government. This will provide some funds to help implement developments in the pharmacist's role following consultation on the Nuffield Foundation's report on pharmacy and the Government's consultative document on primary care services.

The new contract will provide a much better basis for relationships between the Government and the profession. This will make it easier to continue to improve services to the public.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the implications of the recommended distance between pharmacies of at least one kilometre in the proposed new contract for retail pharmacists for the adequacy of services to patients.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the forecast cost to the National Health Service if (a) 500, (b) 1,000 and (c) 1,500 pharmacists were to close with compensation under the proposed new pharmacy contract;

(2) what is the latest estimate of the net savings to the National Health Service from the new pharmacy contract proposals on the assumption that 1,000 pharmacies close with compensation, after taking account of the costs of the new pharmacy practices sub-committees and the latest proposals for an appeal system,

Mr. Hayhoe: Under the new contract pharmacies will be encouraged to be more efficient through changes in the pattern of remuneration. This will put pressure on some small pharmacies which have high unit costs and which cannot be justified in places where there are already adequate National Health Service services. For two years therefore there will be a system of payments to pharmacies who wish to relinquish the National Health Service contract.

The cost to the National Health Service of these one-off payments will, over a period, be completely offset by recurring savings in the overall cost of pharmaceutical services. For every unnecessary small pharmacy that closes a recurring saving will accrue. The level of such savings depends on a number of factors: for example, the number of small pharmacy closures over the two-year period, how demand for National Health Service services is redistributed to other pharmacies, and the efficiency of those pharmcies in dealing with the extra business. No definitive estimate is available therefore on how long it will take for savings to match payments to relinquish contracts, and any necessary administrative costs.

Additional savings of about £4 million will accrue from alterations in the way costs are reimbursed. Available information indicates that the number of contractors relinquishing their contracts will be much lower than the numbers suggested in the questions. The decision to give up a National Health Service contract will be left to the commercial judgment of the individual contractor.

Pharmaceutical Society

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the latest revised appeal proposals put by him to the Pharmaceutical Services negotiating committee.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) on 18 July at column 664.

Incontinence

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidance he has issued on the treatment of incontinence as a qualifying condition for additional requirements for bathing under schedule 4, part II, paragraph 11 of the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements) Regulations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Guidance to adjudication officers on the supplementary benefit legislation, issued by the Chief Adjudication Officer, is published in the "S Manual", a copy of which is in the Library. The guidance on eligibility for additional requirements for baths is at paragraphs S4531—4532.

Waiting Lists

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people are waiting for (a) cataract operations, (b) ear operations to remedy a hearing defect and (c) general orthopaedic surgery; what is the average delay for each operation; and what measures are being taken to reduce waiting lists.

Mr. Whitney: For measures to be taken to reduce waiting lists I refer the right hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Social Services, to my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport on 21 July at column 95. I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member all the information he seeks. Information on waiting lists for admission to hospital is available by the specialty of treatment and not by operation, and it is not therefore possible to give waiting list information for cataract and ear operations. The total number of cases on NHS waiting lists for admission to traumatic and orthopaedic surgery departments in England at 30 September 1985, the latest date for which figures are available centrally, was 129,282. The available information on waiting time is given in the table.

NHS non-psychiatric hospitals, England
Estimated median interval in weeks between the date a patient is placed on the waiting list and the date of admission of patients discharged during 1984

Operation	Weeks
Middle ear and ossicles	15
Eye lens	15
Orthopaedic	12

Health Professionals

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is being done to introduce the use of screening techniques into training for health professionals; and what emphasis is being given to the need to develop preventative measures.

Mr. Whitney: The regional health authorities were asked to include policies for prevention in their 10-year strategic plans and all have done so. The content of training for health professionals is a matter for the relevant professional bodies taking into account service needs, including the development of screening programmes.

Health Education Council

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has on what the Health Education Council does to promote awareness of the need to develop measures that will prevent disabilities from occuring.

Mr. Whitney: The Health Education Council makes available authoritative and sensible advice on a wide range of issues which will promote positive good health and reduce unnecessary illness.

London Ambulance Service

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what were the hours worked by the personnel of the London ambulance service in South-East Thames region in 1985; how many were employed by it full-time in 1985; and what are his estimates of numbers of personnel and hours to be worked in South-East Thames in 1986.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that I am unable to give the hon. Member precisely the information she requires. The number of hours worked by the London ambulance service is not available. However, a normal working week is 40 hours and applying that to the following staffing figures for the south-east division of the London Ambulance Service should give a reasonable approximation:

South East Division of London Ambulance Service Ambulance Personnel*

	Average Number of Staff in Post	Average Weekly Overtime (wte)† Worked	Average Weekly Total (wte)
Actual 1985	497	105	602
Targets 1986	497	25	522

* Follows South East Thames boundary except for Croydon District Health Authority which falls in South West Thames Regional Health Authority, but is served by staff from South East Division.
† Whole time equivalent.
Source: London Ambulance Service.

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what mileage was covered by ambulances run by the London ambulance service in the South-East Thames region in 1985 and in the first quarter of 1986; and what is the estimate of that to be run in 1986.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is as follows:

*South east division of London ambulance service

	Emergency	Non-emergency	Total
Mileage in 1985	808,687	2,029,105	2,837,792
Mileage in first quarter of 1986	192,823	423,397	616,220
Estimated mileage in 1986	838,000	1,600,000	2,438,000

* Follows South-East Thames boundary but includes Croydon district health authority which is part of South-West Thames regional health authority.

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what requests have been made by the South-East Thames regional health authority to district health authorities in respect of the use of the London ambulance service; and what is the target of that authority's request of reduction in the number of non-emergency cases to be carried.

Mr. Whitney: In a letter dated 20 March 1986, the general manager of the South-West Thames regional health authority wrote to the general managers of the three other Thames regions requesting district health authorities to reduce the demand for non-emergency ambulance transport for walking cases by 40 per cent.

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many non-emergency cases were carried by the London ambulance service in South-East Thames region in each of the years 1984 and 1985; and how many he expects to be carried in 1986.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that I am unable to give the hon. Member all the information she requires as the number of cases carried by the London ambulance service is not collected. However, the number of actual non-emergency journeys for the South-East division of the London ambulance service is as follows:

	Number of non-emergency patient journeys
1984 actual	513,381
1985 actual	496,742
1986 estimated	400,000

Drug Abuse

Mr. Rowe asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) by what criteria he will judge the success or failure of the current programme of advertisement on radio and television designed to combat drug abuse; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how much the current programme of television and radio advertising designed to combat drug abuse is costing;

(3) which advertising consultants or agencies are being employed to place advertisements on radio and television designed to combat drug abuse; and how much in fees each of them is receiving;

(4) of which voluntary or charitable organisations his current programme of advertisements on radio and television designed to combat drug abuse makes use;

(5) what arrangements he has made to link his current series of advertisements on radio and television designed to combat drug abuse with helplines or other forms of counselling.

Mr. Whitney: Our campaign of education and information on drug misuse will cost £2 million in 1986-87 including about £850,000 on radio and television advertising. Three advertising agencies have been employed—Yellowhammer Company Ltd., Young and Rubicam Ltd. (Television time buying), Leo Burnett Ltd. (Radio time buying). We do not pay fees to any of these agencies, who have to negotiate commission from media companies.

The effects of the campaign are being independently evaluated by quantitative and qualitative research. The key criteria are awareness of campaign materials and effects on young people's levels of knowledge and attitudes. Results to date are encouraging.

Both parents' and young peoples' press advertising includes a regular advert publicising "Freefone Drug Problems" run by the standing conference on drug abuse and funded by the Department.

Disability Prevention (Expenditure)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much the Government have spent in each of the last five years on the prevention of disability in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) developing countries; and in each case what are the projects being supported.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the right hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Child Abuse

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what new research initiatives he is taking into the apparent increased incidence of child abuse.

Mr. Whitney: As part of its continuing programme of research into child care matters the Department is currently funding research to evaluate various types of intervention in cases of child abuse and is in the process of commissioning new research into rehabilitative and supportive therapy in families in which child sexual abuse has occurred. There are no national statistics to show whether there is increased incidence of "child abuse", which is not easily defined. New arrangements for reports proposed in the draft circular "Child Abuse—Working Together" will enable the Department to monitor trends more effectively.

Mr. Victor Paige

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, further to his answer to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras. on 16 June, Official Report, column 462, what was the total taxable addition to salary received by Mr. Victor Paige in each year he served on the National Health Service management board.

Mr. Fowler: Mr. Paige was employed by the Department from 2 January 1985 to 30 June 1986. From 2 January 1985 to 31 March 1986 he received £8,625 as a taxable addition to salary and from 1 April 1986 to 30 June 1986 £2,625. Mr. Paige made his own pension arrangements and these taxable additions were to compensate him for the loss of benefits he would have received under the principal civil service pension scheme.

Rates

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, in the light of his answer to the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye, of 21 July, he will (a) indicate the timescales and mechanisms involved in developing his proposals on rates through consultation and discussion on the wider proposals for the reform of local government finance, (b) identify those with whom he intends to so consult and (c) clarify the extent to which such consultations and discussions will focus on the reform of local government finance in (i) Scotland alone, (ii) England and Wales alone and (iii) some combination of (i) and (ii) above; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's remarks during the debate on the Social Security Bill yesterday.

Epilepsy (Report)

Mrs. Currie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the report of the working group on services for people with epilepsy will be published.

Mr. Newton: The report of the working group on services for people with epilepsy was published today and will be issued to helth and local authorities in England. Copies have been placed in the Library.

It is not intended as a blueprint for the provision of services by all authorities, but its recommendations to Government could be used as a basis for discussion by health and local authorities on improvements in services. The scope for adoption of recommendations in different areas will depend on the pattern of existing services, availability of resources and local priorities.

I hope that the report will stimulate discussion and be of assistance to professional staff responsible for the treatment and care of people with epilepsy and to managers and planners in the organisation of local services.

Custodianship Allowances

Mr. Wood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what provision he intends to make for the treatment of custodianship allowances for supplementary benefit purposes.

Mr. Major: We intend shortly to refer to the Social Security Advisory Committee proposals to improve the position of supplementary beneficiaries who are receiving local authority custodianship allowances, and of certain young people who may receive supplementary benefit while remaining in full-time non-advanced education. We are also considering the inclusion of a number of minor clarifications and adjustments in related provisions.

School Leavers (Benefit)

Mr. McLoughlin asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the position of school leavers who claim social security benefit.

Mr. Major: Guidance on the eligibility of school leavers for supplementary benefit is contained in the "S Manual", paragraphs 225-2292, and in circular S51/85. I am aware that there has been some confusion following a decision by Social Security Commissioners last year which meant that certain young people who had always been regarded as still being at school for benefit purposes became eligible for supplementary benefit in their own right from Easter, with a concomitant loss of child benefit rights to their parents. There is also evidence that some children who have left school before the legal date may have been claiming benefit. The Government's policy remains that young people who are (or should legally be) still completing their education should normally be treated as dependent upon their parents. We intend to refer to the Social Security Advisory Committee proposals to ensure that the law continues to reflect this intention.

Health Authorities (Documentation)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will issue instructions to district health authorities reminding them of the entitlement of hon. Members to receive all documents and accounts which are available to authority members, even those for confidential consideration in connection with hospitals, services and overall management covering the constituency of the hon. Member concerned and to seek to improve compliance with those rules by all health authorities.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 23 June 1986, c. 67-68]: I regret that my earlier reply contained an error. It should have read as follows. Under section 1(4) of the Public Bodies (Admission to Meetings) Act 1960 members of the press are entitled to receive on request, and subject to appropriate payment, copies of the agenda and related documents for items to be discussed during that part of a health authority's meeting which is open to the public. In addition copies of these documents are normally available to those members of the public who attend the meeting. There is no entitlement to receive or have access to confidential documents relating to items discussed in closed session. Hon. Members have no rights in this respect above those of any member of the public.

Diabetics (Syringes)

Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to allow general practitioners to prescribe plastic syringes to diabetics up to the equivalent cost of glass syringes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 23 July 1986]: No. I am advised that such an arrangement is not practicable.

School Meals

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will estimate the number of (a) families and (b) children who will be affected by the Government's proposed changes in eligibility for school meals under section 70 of the Social Security Bill;

(2) how many (a) families and (b) children he estimates will be affected by the Government's proposed changes in eligibility for school lunches contained in clause 70 of the Social Security Bill in (i) Wales and (ii) mid-Glamorgan.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1986, c. 419]: The proposed changes in entitlement to free school meals entail additional expenditure overall, rather than savings. We anticipate that on the basis of the illustrative assumptions in the technical annex to the White Paper "Reform of Social Security" (Cmnd. 9691), the cash compensation contained in the family credit children's rates in place of free school meals will exceed the savings to local education authorities in no longer providing free school meals to children in FIS families and to those helped under the present local education authorities' discretionary powers. It is not possible to estimate the effect on local authority manpower since this will depend on local factors, including comparative meal numbers and local manpower policies.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will estimate the savings which will accrue to both central Government and local government in manpower and cash, respectively, as a result of the Government's proposed changes in eligibility for school meals under section 70 of the Social Security Bill;

(2) if he will estimate the savings in manpower and cash which will accrue from the Government's proposed changes in eligibility for school lunches contained in clause 70 of the Social Security Bill for (a) central Government and (b) local government in Wales.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1986, c. 419]: The estimates are as follows:

	Number currently receiving free school meals where parents are receiving FIS or under LEA discretionary powers		*Number entitled to cash compensation in place of free school meals under the new family credit arrangements
	Children	Families	Children	Families
Great Britain	545,000	N/A	610,000	335,000
Wales	30,000	N/A	†36,000	†20,000
Mid-Glamorgan	7,500	N/A	N/A	N/A

* On the basis of the illustrative assumptions in the Technical Annex to the White Paper (Cmnd. 9691).

† Reliable estimates of a regional breakdown for family credit are not available; the figures given for Wales therefore reflect the current FIS population increased on a proportionate basis.

TRANSPORT

Roads (Lighting)

Mr. Grist asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has completed his review of policy for the provision of lighting on motorways and all-purpose trunk roads; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Yes. Having carefully considered the views of the bodies consulted, representing all the various interests in road lighting, and the recommendation of the Select Committee on Road Transport's report on road safety, my right hon. Friend has revised the policy for the provision of lighting on motorway and all-purpose trunk roads for which he is the highway authority.

In future, detailed consideration as to whether lighting should be provided will always be given prior to the construction stage, thus allowing for lighting proposals to be included in the public consultation process and any subsequent inquiry.

The decision whether to light in a particular case will be based on an economic assessment of the costs and benefits throughout the life of the lighting scheme, together with a full assessment of environmental factors. Account will also be taken of any significant non-quantifiable road safety factors.

When a night-time accident problem arises on an existing road which is not lit, the case for lighting will also be subject to economic and environmental assessment.

The type of lighting which will afford the best value for money in the particular case will be used except in environmentally sensitive areas where a whiter light source may be installed. This will stimulate greater competition in the industry.

The effectiveness of road lighting and other measures in reducing accidents in fog on existing roads will continue to be the subject of further study by the Department.

In future, all new lighting installations will be monitored year by year in order to assess their effectiveness.

These new arrangements are designed to improve road safety, secure better value for public money, to safeguard against environmental damage and to provide a consistency of approach with that for other highway investment. My right hon. Friend has been concerned to ensure that adequate safeguards for the environment are embodied in the new policy.

A departmental advice note TA 49/86, setting out the revised assessment method relating to the provision of road lighting on motorways and all-purpose trunk roads is being issued and copies have been placed in the Library.

Redevelopment (Hammersmith)

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Transport with regard to the proposed redevelopment of the Hammersmith central island site by Bredero Projects Ltd. (1) whether London Regional Transport has entered a building agreement or granted an option with Bredero Projects Ltd., or any other company, to enable redevelopment, for which planning permisson was granted on 24 November 1980, to take place;

(2) whether London Regional Transport has disposed of any part of its ownership, or granted an option to disposal to Bredero Projects Ltd., or any other company, to enable the redevelopment for which planning permission was granted on 24 November 1980, to take place;

(3) whether London Regional Transport has granted any form of lease or option to Bredero Projects Ltd., or any other company, to enable the redevelopment for which planning permission was granted on 24 November 1980, to take place.

Mr. David Mitchell: Arrangements between London Regional Transport and Bredero Projects Ltd., for the development of the Hammersmith site are commercial matters for them.

EC (Ports Competition)

Sir Julian Ridsdale asked the Secretary of State for Transport what are the implications of the financial help given by the Governments of some member states to their ports for European competition policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: The last detailed study of this question was carried out between 1977 and 1980 by the European Commission with a working group of experts from major Community ports. The majority concluson was that differences between the financial regimes of ports did not seem capable of provoking serious distortions of competition. The study needs to be reviewed and the Commission has started by updating the factual background to it.

Sir Julian Ridsdale asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made to ensure fair competition between ports within the European Community.

Mr. Moore: Financial assistance to ports is subject to the state aids provisions of the EEC Treaty (Articles 92 and 93) and financial relations between public authorities and public port undertakings are covered by the provisions of the transparency directive. The Commission has sufficient powers to deal with distortions of competition resulting from financial assistance.

Goods and Services (Contracts)

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has in respect of the British Airports Authority, British Airways, the British Railways Board, the British Waterways Board, the Civil Aviation Authority and the National Bus Company as to the total amount spent on the acquisition of goods and services, expressed in terms of net contract prices; and how many individual contracts comprised that volume of purchasing for each of the five years for which figures are available, giving both the overall totals in each case, and the totals disaggregated into the following categories (a) capital and revenue expenditure, (b) construction and non-construction projects, (c) goods and services purchased from United Kingdom-based companies and non-United Kingdom-based companies and (d) goods and services purchased from the private sector and other parts of the public sector.

Mr. Moore: My Department does not maintain records of the kind of information requested by the hon. Member, apart from that which is published in the industries' own annual reports and accounts, copies of which are available in the Library. My Department is not responsible for the British Waterways Board; questions about its activities should be directed to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Road Accidents

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information his Department has on the relationship between speed and the severity of road accidents; and what action he proposes to take on that information.

Mr. Moore: Accident risk and severity generally increase with speed. If properly chosen and enforced, speed limits constrain speeds. On local roads where most accidents happen, authorities can also influence speeds by appropriate engineering techniques. My Department has issued advice on both aspects.

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport what the number of accidents and the accident rate for coaches is per 100 million vehicle kilometres, by type and class of road, and by severity, for each of the last 10 years; and whether he will take steps to ensure that future editions of "Road Accidents (Great Britain)" disaggregates the rates for buses and coaches in all the tables which refer to bus and coach accidents.

Mr. David Mitchell: I regret that the information requested is not available because the road accident report form does not distinguish between buses and coaches. The road accident reporting system is currently under review and this is one of the aspects under consideration.

Speed Governors

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent research his Department has carried out or commissioned into speed governors, or limiters, and on speed alerters, with particular reference to coaches; what the conclusions of such work have been; and what action he proposes to take.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Transport and Road Research Laboratory has conducted some research into the operation of speed limiters, which showed that in general these devices work satisfactorily. The BSI is about to seek public comment on a draft British standard for speed limiters prepared at the request of the Department. This standard will form the basis of regulations which we expect to make early next year to require all high-speed coaches to be fitted with speed limiters. Currently we have no work in progress on speed alerters.

M40 (Ardley Service Area)

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what consultation his Department had with Cherwell district council prior to the announcement of Ardley as a site for a motorway service area on the M40 extension;

(2) on what days (a) Esso Petroleum plc and (b) Cherwell district council were told of his Department's decision to site a motorway service area at Ardley.

Mr. David Mitchell: There were informal advance consultations with the district council. These took the form of meetings and correspondence. The proposal was announced on 10 July, and an advance notice of the announcement was sent to the district council on 9 July. No advance notice was given to Esso. Formal consultations are now proposed with the district council under the procedures applying to Crown development.

Heathrow Airport (Fifth Terminal)

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, pursuant to the answer of 18 July, Official Report, column 657, he will now list the undertakings given by his Department specifically to the hon. Member for Windsor and Maidenhead since July 1981 regarding the Government's policy towards a fifth terminal at Heathrow airport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: On 23 July 1981 my hon. Friend received an answer from the then Under-Secretary of State for Trade about a fifth terminal at Heathrow. The Government's policy remains that cited in my answer of 18 July 1986.

Motor Cycles (Noise)

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received on the subject of a static noise test for motor cycles; and what has been his response.

Mr. David Mitchell: The National Motorcycle Council has sent us proposals for the introduction of a static noise test for motor cycles, and the Department is still considering these.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received from hon. Members, public organisations and the general public on motor cycle noise.

Mr. David Mitchell: I refer the hon. Member to my reply yesterday.

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of complaints he receives on motorcycle noise relate to unmodified standard motor cycles and motor cycles with modified or illegal replacement exhaust systems, respectively.

Mr. David Mitchell: I shall answer this question shortly.

Driving Test

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration he has given to including motorway driving as an addition to the driving test.

Mr. David Mitchell: This subject was considered fully last year following publication of the first report from the Transport Select Committee on road safety which recommended that dual carriageway driving should be included in the driving test. We were unable to accept this for reasons which similarly apply to the inclusion of motorway driving.

At present we provide both an even-handed test and a national network of centres which are reasonably accessible to everyone. As less than half the present network of L test centres are within reach of dual carriageways and even fewer are within reach of motorways we could not do this if motorway driving was prescribed as an element of the test.

Seat Belts

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of current seat belt wearing levels for front seat occupants of cars and light vans.

Mr. David Mitchell: Seat belt wearing surveys are now carried out at six monthly intervals at 55 sites, involving observation of about 100,000 cars and light vans. The latest survey, carried out in April, showed wearing rates to be 94 per cent. for both drivers and front seat passengers of cars and light vans.

Northern Lighthouse Board

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to commemorate the bicentenary of the Northern Lighthouse Board; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: It gives me great pleasure to offer my congratulations and best wishes to the commissioners and their staff on the occasion of the bicentenary of the Northern Lighthouse Board. I understand that its first meeting was held in Edinburgh on 1 August 1786 and I am sure it gives everyone concerned with that body the greatest satisfaction that a Scottish institution of such high distinction and with such a long and proud tradition of service to mariners, should still flourish.

Stansted Airport (Rail Link)

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he is yet in a position to announce his decision on the British Railways Board's proposal to invest in a new rail link to Stansted airport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I am pleased to announce to the House that the Government have today approved the board's investment in a new electrified spur from the London-Cambridge main line to a new station beneath the airport terminal. We made clear in the "Airports Policy" White Paper that we would be pleased to approve a rail link to Stansted airport if there was a commercial case for providing one. BR has shown that there is. It intends to run the fast airport services with new rolling stock. This is included in the investment approval we have given. Subject to getting the necessary statutory powers to construct the rail link, the board is sure that it can provide an attractive, reliable and commercially viable rail service to the airport.

Public Utilities Streetworks Act 1950 (Review)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has yet completed his consideration of the report of the review chaired by Professor Michael Horne of the Public Utilities Street Works Act 1950.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Yes. We are most grateful to all those who responded to our request for comments following publication of the report in November last year. Having considered the report in the light of all those comments, we accept most of the recommendations. In view of the number and detail of the recommendations, I am placing in the Library a memorandum giving our comments on each.

We endorse the central recommendation of the report that, subject to certain reserve powers in the event of default, the responsibility for carrying out reinstatements following works in the highway by public utilities should be placed upon those utilities themselves. It is envisaged however that local authorities would be able to tender for such work if they wished. We also endorse the related recommendations of the report for securing an improved standard of reinstatements, including better specifications for materials and workmanship, new performance standards, and improved training for workmen. We accept the need to strengthen the powers of highway authorities to inspect works, but with a simpler system of charging for such inspections. We are sure that the integration of responsibility for reinstatements, together with the associated improvements in standards, will promote speedier and more satisfactory reinstatements, to the benefit of all road users. We also accept generally the recommendations for improvement of traffic management, and for improving the safeguards for road users, in particular those who are handicapped.

The majority recommendation on the costs of diversionary works on utility apparatus required in consequence of highway schemes has proved controversial. We accept that there are problems with the existing system, but we are not convinced that the majority recommendation is the right solution. We think it would be preferable for the parties involved to agree a code of practice on diversionary works, in order to ensure that no unnecessary works are undertaken.

It is proposed therefore to invite the local authority associations and the National Joint Utilities Group to engage in negotiations to this end, and to report on them by the end of 12 months at the latest. In the event of the negotiations not succeeding, the Government would need to consider bringing forward a cost sharing solution in order to provide the necessary incentives.

Primary legislation will be required to implement certain of these recommendations, and the Government intend to bring it forward when there is a suitable opportunity. This legislation would take a simpler form than the present Act, and would provide for a number of matters to be dealt with by subordinate legislation. However, it is important that action should proceed on those recommendations which do not require prior legislation or on which detailed technical work is required to prepare the ground. In this work, it is important that we should keep in close touch with both the local authorities and the utilities, and have direct access to the best expert advice available. I accordingly propose at an early stage to set up a street works advisory committee on the broad lines recommended in the report.

We believe that action on the lines I have indicated will make a positive and lasting contribution to establishing a more satisfactory framework for the execution of works by public utilities in highways, and will result in safer and more convenient arrangements for all road users.

Airports Act 1986

Dame Jill Knight asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to implement the Airports Act 1986.

Mr. Moore: On 15 July, I approved proposals and a scheme under section 1 of the Act providing for the reorganisation of the British Airport Authority's undertaking into separate airport companies on 31 July. On the same day I made two orders which bring into force certain sections of the Act on 31 July and 1 August and which provide for the dissolution of the BAA and the vesting of its undertaking on 1 August in BAA plc. From 1 August, therefore, the whole of parts I and V of the Act (and certain related sections) will be in force.

I propose to make two further orders shortly, to designate the BAA's seven airports — following their transfer to subsidiary companies — under section 88 of the Civil Aviation Act 1982 (detention and sale of aircraft) and under section 35 of that Act (facilities for consultation). This will provide for continuity of powers to detain and sell aircraft in default of payment of airport charges and of the duty to provide adequate facilities for consultation with interested parties on matters concerning the management or administration of their airports.

On 8 September, two months after Royal Assent, parts II and III and other provisions, such as exemption from Sunday trading restrictions for certain airports, will come into force, as provided for in section 85(4) of the Act. Once these parts of the Act are in force, I intend to use my powers under sections 13 and 15 to direct local authorities to form airport companies and to submit schemes for the transfer of property, rights and liabilities to those companies. In addition, as was said in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Neale) on 21 July, I intend to use my powers under section 31 to promulgate traffic distribution rules for the London airports system and to confirm the current rules for the Scottish Lowland airports system.

I hope to make an order bringing the remaining parts of the Act into force on 1 October. This will, amongst other things, set in place the scheme of economic regulation which requires all airports with a turnover above £1 million in two of the last three years to apply to the CAA for a permission to levy airport charges. Three related orders will also be made: an order under section 7 of the Civil Aviation Act 1982, dealing with procedural regulations governing the exercise of the Civil Aviation Authority's functions under parts III and IV of the Airports Act; an order under section 40 of the Airports Act designated Heathrow, Gatwick, Stansted and Manchester international airports for the purposes of economic regulation, which will require mandatory conditions to be imposed on those airports setting a maximum limit on airport charges and requiring accounting transparency; and an order under section 47 making regulations for charges to be payable by airport operators in respect of expenses incurred by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission in performing their functions under the Act.

Soon after 1 October, I propose to notify the CAA under section 53(1) that I intend to perform certain of the CAA's functions relating to the grant of permissions to and imposition of conditions on the seven BAA airport companies. I will give details of these permissions and the conditions to which they are subject nearer to the time of flotation.

British Airports Authority

Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will publish the British Airports Authority's response to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's report on the Authority's commercial activities, Cmnd. 9644.

Mr. Moore: The MMC's report on its investigation of the commercial activities of the British Airports Authority was published on 10 December 1985. I have now received the authority's response to the commission's report and I have arranged for copies to be placed in the Library.

The commission was asked to report whether in carrying out its commercial activities the authority could improve its efficiency or reduce its costs or improve the service provided. The commission was particularly asked to examine four issues: the scope for increasing competition at the point of sale, the procedure for awarding concession contracts, the control of the standard of service provided by concessionaires, and the administration of leases.

The commission concluded that the authority has operated its commercial activities in a generally satisfactory manner. The Commission also concluded, with one member dissenting, that in relation to its commercial activities the authority was not pursuing a course of conduct which operates against the public interest. But the commission made a number of recommendations which would, in its judgment, improve the authority's efficiency, reduce its costs or improve the service it provides.

I endorse the commission's general conclusions, and I accept its view that the authority should make every effort to increase competition wherever possible. Like the commission, however, I recognise the opportunities for doing so, particularly at the point of sale, are limited because of operational requirements and space constraints.

The Authority's response shows that it has accepted 23 of the Commission's 34 recommendations wholly or in part, and that it has already implemented 20 of these. I welcome the Authority's response, but I am writing to the Chairman to ask him to keep under review those matters which the Commission identified specifically as worthy of continuing consideration and possible future action.

The Commission thought it necessary to consider its findings in the light of the proposed privatisation of the authority. I welcome its conclusion that there was no reason to believe the general sense of the recommendations in its report would be found inapplicable to the new organisation envisaged. However, when drafting the legislation that became the Airports Act 1986, the Government took into account the commission's view that the search by the new enterprise for higher profits for its shareholders might generate additional pressures which could lead to a possible abuse of a monopoly.

The Airports Act 1986 will establish a system of economic regulation for airports. The CAA will, after a reference to the MMC, be empowered to impose conditions on airport operators' permissions to levy airport charges which will, inter alia, prevent such operators adopting trade practices or pricing policies in their core airport activities which unfairly discriminate between users, concessionaires or prospective concessionaires, or which unfairly exploit the operators' monopoly position in respect of, for example, the handling of passengers, baggage or cargo. In addition, at airports designated by the Secretary of State (which will include Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted), the MMC will conduct a full review of the airport business every five years and will report on any practice they find operating against the public interest.

In reviewing any matter which relates to the granting of concessions, the MMC will be required, amongst other things, to have regard to the furtherance of the reasonable interests of concessionaires. The CAA will be obliged to impose conditions remedying or preventing the adverse effects of any practices which are against the public interest. Operators of designated airports will also be obliged by the CAA to publish accounts which show separately the results of their commercial and traffic operations: the CAA may also require operators of non-designated airports to publish such information. Together, these measures are designed to ensure that any possible abuse of a monopoly position is prevented.

Given the extent to which the authority has already implemented the recommendations of the Commission, the impending privatisation of the authority, and the framework of economic regulation which will apply to the authority's airport companies, I do not consider a further statement reporting progress is necessary.

Road Traffic Control Equipment

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has about the market share in road traffic control equipment currently held by the Plessey Company and GEC.

Mr. Moore: Market share was one of the factors to be considered by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission in assessing the proposal for a merger between GEC and Plessey in the light of the evidence submitted by them. My right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry now has the Commission's report before him and will make an announcement as soon as practicable.

Manchester International Airport

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has had concerning the proposed rail link from Manchester international airport; what response has been made; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: My predecessor met the parties particularly interested in this rail link on 14 May. At that meeting, British Rail explained their view that the link would not be commercially viable, and in the light of that, they, the airport and the PTA agreed to consider what contribution they would be prepared to make towards the cost of the scheme. When I visited Manchester airport on Monday, the local authorities reiterated their strong support for the scheme. I have asked them and British Rail, to write to me summarising where their discussions now stand.

NATIONAL FINANCE

VAT

Mr. Forman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the policy of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise towards costs of unsuccessful appeals by taxpayers to the independent value added tax tribunals against penalties imposed under the provisions of the Finance Act 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The practice of Customs and Excise in seeking costs in unsuccessful appeals heard by the VAT Tribunals was set out by the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), when he was Financial Secretary to the Treasury, on 13 November 1978. There has been no change in policy since then, but with the new enforcement powers and rights of appeal, particularly on the grounds of reasonable excuse, enacted in the Finance Act 1985, it may be helpful to restate it. As a general rule, Customs and Excise do not seek costs against unsuccessful appellants. They do, however, ask for costs in certain narrowly defined cases so as to provide protection for public funds and the general body of taxpayers. They will therefore seek to continue to ask for costs at those exceptional tribunal hearings of substantial and complex cases where large sums are involved and which are comparable with High Court cases, unless the appeal involves an important general point of law, requiring clarification. They will also continue to consider seeking costs where the appellant has misused the tribunal procedure—for example in frivolous or vexatious cases, or where the appellant has failed to appear or to be represented at a mutually arranged hearing without sufficient explanation, or where the appellant has first produced at a hearing relevant evidence which ought properly to have been disclosed at an earlier stage and which could have saved public funds had it been produced timeously.

The new penalty provisions and right of appeal to the value added tax tribunals have made no change to this policy. Customs and Excise, with the agreement of the Council on Tribunals, consider that appeals against penalties imposed under section 13 of the Finance Act 1985 on the grounds that a person has evaded VAT and his conduct has involved dishonesty fall to be considered as being comparable with High Court cases. Where such appeals are unsuccessful, Customs and Excise will normally seek an award of costs.

In all cases the question whether or not costs should be awarded will, of course, remain entirely within the discretion of the tribunal concerned and the amount of any such award will be fixed either by that tribunal, or by the High Court, as provided by tribunal procedure rules.

Customs and Excise, in consultation with the Council on Tribunals, will continue to keep their policy under carefull scrutiny.

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has considered the fifth report of the Select Committee on Statutory Instruments in regard to the Value Added Tax (Repayment Supplement) Regulations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: Yes. I recognise the concern expressed by the Committee and by my hon. Friends the Members for Stafford (Mr. Cash), for Newark (Mr. Alexander) and for Surrey, North-West (Mr. Grylls) who entered a prayer against the regulations, that the position of the taxpayer should be fully protected by law, and that there may be room for doubt whether in their present form the regulations achieve this objective. I have therefore authorised Her Majesty's Customs and Excise to revoke Statutory Instrument 1986 No. 909 and to lay before the House today new regulations which are based on objective criteria to establish the dates of the relevant events.

EC (Budget Council)

Mrs. McCurley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statememt on the latest meeting of the European Economic Community Budget Council.

Mr. Brooke: The Budget Council met in Brussels on 21-22 July. I served as chairman and my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary represented the United Kingdom.

The Council discussed the proposals put forward by the Commission in its preliminary draft budget for 1987. No agreement was reached, and the Council will meet again on 8-9 September with a view to establishing a draft budget for 1987.

Income Tax

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, further to the reply to the hon. Member for Kensington, Official Report, 3 June 1986, column 433 what is his estimate of the amount by which the income tax base was reduced in 1985-86 on account of all the income tax reliefs listed in the 1986 public expenditure White Paper.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The reliefs listed in the 1986 Public Expenditure White Paper reduced the 1985-86 income tax base by approximately £100 billion. This estimate excludes reliefs (such as capital allowances) used in arriving at net profits for Schedule D, and personal allowances for individuals who are not on Inland Revenue records because their incomes are below the tax thresholds.

Taxation

Mr. Pawsey asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much revenue was received in direct and indirect taxation from the cement industry in the latest financial year for which figures are available.

Mr. Brooke: Net VAT in the financial year 1985-86 from the cement industry was £58·4 million. A comparable figure for the yield of direct taxes from the cement industry could only be made available at disproportionate cost.

Incomes and Taxation

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) whether he will publish in the Official Report tables showing for those above and for those below pensionable age the estimated number of incomes and average of income tax payable by range of total income on the same basis as given in the reply to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby on 31 January 1983, Official Report, columns 20-22;

(2) whether he will bring up to date the information on the number of incomes and average rate of tax payable by range of total income published in the Official Report on 31 January 1983, column 20, in reply to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby; and if he will add figures for incomes of £50,000 or more to three places of decimals.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The latest estimates based on a projection of the 1983-84 "Survey of Personal Incomes" are shown in the following tables. Total income includes only those forms of income liable to tax, before the deduction of personal allowances and reliefs.

Wife's Earned Income Allowance

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) whether he will bring up to date the information concerning wife's earned income allowance published in the Official Report on 28 March 1983, Official Report, columns 59-60, in reply to a question from the hon. Member for Grimsby;

(2) whether he will bring up to date the information concerning the wife's earned income allowance published in the Official Report on 25 January 1983, Official Report, column 392 and on 8 March 1983, Official Report, column 340, in reply to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby.

Mr. Norman Lamont: All married women with earned income benefit from the wife's earned income allowance; but many with small amounts, below the PAYE reporting limit, are not known to the Inland Revenue. Excluding there, thee are about 6·8 million earning wives on record, 4·0 million of whom pay tax. In a full year at 1986-87 income levels, the yield from abolishing the wife's earned income allowance would be around £3·5 billion. This estimate does not include tax that would become due if the allowance were withdrawn from those women not on Inland Revenue records. It is based on the assumption that the election for separate taxation of wife's earnings would no longer be available as otherwise nearly all two earner couples would benefit from the election, and the yield would be substantially reduced. Further information about the distribution of earning wives, by the couple's joint taxable income and by the wife's income, is given in the following tables.

Personal Taxation

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for the current financial year the amount of tax and full rate national insurance payable in the circumstances described in the answer to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby on 5 April 1984, Official Report, column 630, and if he will include any credit from child benefit and single parent benefit in this and in the earlier years referred to.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Information in the following table is based on estimates of average earnings for full time female employees, from all occupations, paid at adult rates.

Mortgage Interest

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) whether he will bring up to date the information concerning the number of taxpayers qualifying for mortgage interest published in the Official Report on 25 July 1985, columns 727-28, in reply to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby;

(2) whether he will bring up to date the information concerning mortgage interest relief published in the Official Report on 18 July 1985, column 258, in answer to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Revised aggregate figures for 1984, and estimates for 1985, are given in the table. The average cost of mortgage interest relief per mortgage for 1986-87 is estimated to be about £580. The mortgage interest rates assumed are those currently charged by the lender.

Following the introduction of the arrangements for giving mortgage interest relief at source from April 1983, it is no longer possible to estimate the distribution of mortgage interest relief from tax records (except for relief on mortgages outside the scope of MIRAS and relief given at rates in excess of the basic rate). Some estimates of the distribution of mortgage interest relief can be obtained from alternative sources, such as the family expenditure survey, but the sample sizes do not permit reliable estimates to made in the detail requested.

Taxation

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing his estimate of the proportion of revenue from taxation in the current financial year accounted for by taxes on capital, including non-domestic rates, and taxes on labour; and if he will provide similar estimates for 1956, 1966, 1976 and 1979.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I regret that the information the hon. Member requires is not available for financial years 1956-57, 1966-67 and 1986-87. However, tables 6·5 and 6.B.3 in the "Financial Statement and Budget Report" provide some details of the budget forecast of revenues for 1986-87. Figures for taxes on capital and labour as a proportion of total taxes for 1976-77 and 1979-80 are given below along with figures for 1985-86, the latest year for which data is available.

Percentages

Financial year	Taxes on capital	Taxes on labour	Other	Total
1976-77	17·6	54·9	27·5	100·0
1979-80	18·9	49·2	31·9	100·0
1985-86	23·9	43·4	32·7	100·0

Taxes on capital include corporation tax, North sea taxes and royalties, income tax on investment income, surtax, capital gains tax, capital transfer tax and estate duty, development land tax, the betterment levy, and local authority non-domestic rates.

Taxes on labour include income tax on earned and self-employment income—including pensions, benefits to the unemployed, and statutory sick pay—employers' and employees' national insurance contributions and national insurance surcharge. The data for earlier years have been adjusted, to reflect the current arrangements for giving relief at source for life assurance premiums and mortgage interest, in order to produce a consistent series.

Taxation (Tobacco)

Mr. Dubs asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much revenue from corporation tax he estimates will be lost to the Treasury in the current fiscal year as a result of the deduction from assessable profits of the tobacco companies contributing to the cost of the advertising campaign to publicise the law against the sale of cigarettes to children; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I regret that this information is not available.

Wife's Earnings Elections

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report the estimated number and cost of wife's earnings elections by range of income at 1986-87 income levels at current rates of taxation together with the total.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Estimates are as follows:

Number and cost of wife's earnings elections in 1986-87

Range of joint total income (lower limit) £ per annum	Number ('000s)	Cost (£ million)
20,000	—	—
25,000	30	10
30,000	100	50
40,000	30	50
50,000	40	130
Total	200	240

Taxation (Benefits)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will bring up to date the information given in the reply dated 25 July 1985, Official Report, column 724, to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby on the taxable value of benefits subject to taxation under special rules; and if he will add (i) the estimated value of benefits not subject to such rules, (ii) the proportion by number and value of new private cars purchased by businesses of all kinds for the use of a nominated persons, (iii) the estimated value of cars so purchased and (iv) the estimate of the yield in tax on profits if all non-pecuniary benefits were disallowed as a business expense and made taxable in the hands of the recipient.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Provisional estimates for 1986-87 of the taxable values of benefits subject to taxation under special rules, are as follows:

	£ million
Company cars and car fuel available for private use	1,200
Accommodation	15
Vouchers, including luncheon vouchers	35
Cheap and interest-free loans	40
Private medical insurance	100

The taxable value of other benefits and expenses that is, those subject to taxation under the general rules) is provisionally estimated, for 1986-87, at £300 million.

So far as the details requested at (ii), (iii) and (iv) are concerned, I regret that insufficient information is centrally available on which to base estimates.

Pensions

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will bring up to date the information on the growth of life assurance pension schemes given in the answer to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby on 7 March 1984, Official Report, columns 581-82, and if he will add figures for unit trusts and investment trusts together with his estimate of the gain in revenue to the Exchequer which would result from the ending of tax relief for pension schemes.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Information on the growth of life assurance and pension funds is published in "Financial Statistics", copies of which are in the Library. Tables are also included about unit trusts and investment trusts. The revenue effect of withdrawing reliefs from pension schemes would depend on the alternative tax regime adopted. Direct revenue costs of some of the components of these reliefs are given in table 2.24 of "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1986-87 to 1988-89" (Cmnd. 9702).

Principal Scientific Officers

Mr. Jackson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his policy on the unification of payments of principal scientific officers in new unified grade 7; what payments are involved; and by what date the principal scientific officer grade will reach the maximum of the new unified grade.

Mr. Brooke: The Government's policy on extending unified grading in the Civil Service to principal level was announced on 26 July 1985 at column 776. Arrangements were then made to bring the 11,000 staff concerned, including principal scientific officers, into the new structure. The benefits to staff, particularly PSOs, of the extension of unified grading in terms of enhanced career opportunities and substantial increases in pay are considerable. The grade 7 scale will ultimately provide a pay increase of almost £2,000 for former PSOs on the maximum of their scale.

With such substantial sums involved for a large group of staff — there are more than 2,000 PSOs in Government Departments and as many again in non-departmental public bodies—it was important to devise arrangements which would phase in the considerable cost. The assimilation arrangements for former PSOs provide for them to be fully assimilated to the pay of the new unified grade by January 1990. The same approach was adopted for other grades entering the new grade 7, but the time taken varies according to the size of the overall increase in pay.

As part of this year's Civil Service pay award for scientists, the Government have already agreed to improve substantially the rate of assimilation to the final grade 7 pay scale for former PSOs by awarding an additional £500 for those on the maximum of the scale and £400 for those on other points over and above the general 6 per cent. offer for other Civil Service grades.

Customs and Excise

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to introduce a procedure whereby members of the public can complain to an independent authority about the behaviour of officers working in the Department of Customs and Excise.

Mr. Brooke: No. I consider to be adequate the well established procedures for considering complaints against actions by Customs and Excise staff through Members of Parliament or the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the procedure and who must be present when the Post Office opens private mail at the request of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise.

Mr. Brooke: Postal staff are required to produce to the appropriate Customs officer any imported mail which the officer wishes to examine in the course of his statutory duties. When mail is opened both Customs and Post Office staff would normally be present.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer under what circumstances and by what authority Her Majesty's Customs and Excise may ask the Post Office to open private mail.

Mr. Brooke: Customs and Excise staff may ask the Post Office to open mail in any circumstances where they consider it necessary to ensure that any duty or tax is properly assessed and charged or to prevent the unlawful importation of prohibited or restricted goods. The legal authority for this is the Postal Parcels (Customs and Excise) Regulations 1986.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place in the Library a copy of directives issued to officers of the Department of Customs and Excise relating to the detention of imported articles.

Mr. Brooke: No.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what procedure is available to members of the public to claim compensation from Her Majesty's Customs and Excise; and under what circumstances compensation is normally paid.

Mr. Brooke: Members of the public may claim compensation from HM Customs and Excise either directly or by means of a civil action in the courts. The main area where compensation may be paid is in cases where the Department accepts liability for causing damage to goods as a direct result of actions by the Department and where, for example, the goods were themselves not prohibited or used to conceal prohibited goods.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what safeguards exist over the use by officers in Her Majesty's Customs and Excise of the power to request the Post Office to open private mail.

Mr. Brooke: Customs officers are empowered to request the Post Office to open private mail to protect the revenue or to enforce import prohibitions. They are required to respect the privacy of personal correspondence. Officers are instructed to act solely within their legal powers. Allegations of abuse may be pursued through internal disciplinary procedures, complaint to MPs or the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration, or civil action in the courts.

Obscenity

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in the light of the judgment of the European Court in the Conegate case, case 121/85, and the abandonment of the case against Gay's The Word bookshop, he intends to introduce legislation to amend the law on the prohibition of the importation of indecent or obscene articles; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: In the light of the judgment of the European Court, Customs and Excise will apply the import prohibition on indecent or obscene articles in line with relevant domestic legislation, both in respect of imports from the European Community and those from elsewhere. Whether United Kingdom legislation requires amendment will be considered in the light of experience of the new arrangements.

Government Supplies and Contractors

Mr. Straw asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what procedures or machinery exist to monitor adherence to contractual terms by Government suppliers and contractors; if any firm has ever lost a contract with a Government Department, or been removed or suspended from an approved list maintained by a Government Department, or has been penalised in any other way, through its failure to comply with (a) any contractual term, (b) the term relating to the Race Relations Act 1976 and (c) any other statutory duty.

Mr. Brooke: The Department letting a contract is responsible for monitoring adherence to contractual terms and for taking any action which would be necessary. Central records are not kept and the information sought could not be obtained without disproportionate expenditure.

Goods and Services (Contracts)

Mr. Straw asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer which Departments maintain approved lists of contractors or suppliers; how many firms appear on each approved list maintained by each Department; which firms appear on each approved list maintained by each Department; what policy each Department pursues in relation to the frequency with which it reviews its approved lists and in respect of admissions to or exclusions from the lists.

Mr. Brooke: All major purchasing Departments maintain approved lists of contractors or suppliers. No records are kept centrally, and policy in respect of frequency of review and admissions to and exclusions from the lists are matters for individual Departments. There is, however, a standard list of questions dealing with financial and general information.

Mr. Straw asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the 1,000 largest public supply contracts entered into by all nationalised industries where the contract was entered into with a private sector organisation, in the last five years for which figures are available, naming in each case the Government Department and the private sector concern, as well as the nature of the product or service supplied.

Mr. Brooke: This information is not held centrally. Purchasing by nationalised industries is a matter for the industries themselves.

Mr. Straw asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the 1,000 largest public supply contracts entered into by all Government Departments where the contract was entered into with a private sector organisation, in the last five years for which figures are available, naming in each case the Government Department and the private sector concern, as well as the nature of the product or service supplied.

Mr. Brooke: This information is not held centrally and could not be obtained without disproportionate cost.

Mr. Straw asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total amount spent in respect of each Department on the acquisition of goods and services expressed in terms of net contract prices; and how many individual contracts comprised that volume of purchasing for each of the last five years for which figures are available, giving both the overall totals for each Department and the totals disaggregated into the following categories: (a) capital and revenue expenditure, (b) construction and non-construction projects, (c) goods and services purchased from United Kingdom-based companies and non-United Kingdom-based companies and (d) goods and services purchased from the private sector and from other parts of the public sector.

Mr. Brooke: Information in the form requested is not available and could not be obtained without disproportionate cost. Information on new contracts let for goods and services in the calendar years 1983 and 1984, excluding construction contracts and Ministry of Defence warlike expenditure, is as tabulated below. Similar figures for earlier years are not available.

Income Tax (Refunds)

Mr. Higgins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why the Inland Revenue does not provide taxpayers receiving cheques covering refunds of income tax with information on that tax year and other details to enable them to identify the period to which any refund relates.

Mr. Lawson: It is the Inland Revenue's normal practice to accompany refund payments with a computation and explanation. If my right hon. Friend has a specific case in mind where this has not happened, perhaps he would like to send me details.

Crown Estates Commissioners

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that the Crown Estates Commissioners have met their obligations in respect of the land left to them by the late Colonel McEwan in the village of Kippen; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: The title arising from this bequest by the late Colonel McEwan contained no restrictions on the future management of the estate. I am satisfied that the Crown Estate Commissioners have met their obligations in their management of the land.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Royal Ulster Constabulary

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many requests for transfer to mainland police forces have been made since 1 January to the latest available date by officers based at Antrim Royal Ulster Constabulary station.

Mr. Scott: During the period 1 January 1986 to 11 July 1986 no recruitment inquiries have been received by the RUC from GB forces about any member of the Royal Ulster Constabulary based at Antrim Royal Ulster Constabulary station.

Drugs

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons were in prison for drug misuse in each of the past five years.

Mr. Scott: The figures are as follows:

1981	9
1982	14
1983	19
1984	6
1985	10
1986	7

These figures include persons imprisoned for possession of drugs, trafficking and forgery of prescriptions to obtain drugs

Security

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement regarding security procedures in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Scott: The Government remain committed to sustained effort under the rule of law designed to achieve the eradication of terrorism in Northern Ireland.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the security statistics for the first six months of the current year are now available together with details of persons charged with terrorist-type offences and convictions for scheduled offences for the year.

Mr. Tom King [pursuant to his reply, 23 July 1986]: Yes, the statistics together with those since 1971 are as follows:
